NORTHERN HARD MAPLE

Deservedly, you'll agree, this splendid and truly modern school received the Honor Award for 1955 from Chicago chapter, AIA. One thought-provoking editorial comment marks "the total absence of materials which will not withstand secondary school usage without repeated maintenance." And surely this observation holds true of the playcourt area in the Athletic Center building (pictured)! For here the sinewy toughness, the resiliency and the bright, genial warmth of Northern Hard Maple faces up to the multiplied millions of carefree teen-age footfalls which will be its lot for years to come. Virtually unanimously, athletic coaches and physical education authorities agree that no other flooring, natural or synthetic, measures up to Northern Hard Maple for recreational purposes. It fights scuffs, scars, dents and abrasion. It minimizes shin splints and bruises, sharpens peripheral vision. Maintenance is simple and relatively cheap. And-"there's always a new floor underneath!" See Sweet's 13j-MA. Write for latest list of MFMA-approved finishing products.

HOW SELECTEMP HEATING WORKS

Iron Fireman SelecTemp is a complete heating system in which each room is an independent zone. Each room heating unit (with its own built-in thermostat) circulates filtered warm air, heated by low pressure steam, which is supplied through small copper tubing. Both fans and thermostats are non-electric; no wiring required.

IRON FIREMA Every room a zone Gentlemen:

Since we have experienced one complete heating season with our Iron Fireman SelecTemp heating system, we are thoroughly convinced that we made a wise choice for our church educational building.

As in most buildings of this type, there are many age groups and each might require a different temperature. Not only are we able to supply each with the temperature desired, but according to our surveys the temperature does not vary as much as one degree within a zone. We think this is remarkable because even when our classrooms are filled to capacity the temperature does not exceed that of the thermostat

Frequently during the week various meetings are held, and unlike other heating systems, we can heat only the room in which the meeting takes place. We have found there is no necessity of preheating this room because just by raising the thermostat setting the unit starts and after operating at full capacity for a very short time the room is comfortable and the heater begins to modulate. Also our general church offices, including the pastor's study, are located in this building and we can heat only these rooms when the other part of the building is not occupied, and does not require heat.

There are many other features that we like, such as low operating cost, remote location of the boiler, no electrical control problems and no power consumption. Even with all the advantages mentioned, our system cost much less than others with control of individual room temperature, and was competitive with systems without individual room controls.

> N. W. HALLMAN, Chairman Building and Grounds Committee

SelecTemp room units, only 18" high, are recessed in walls; take no floor space. Heat is steady; temperature and volume of air are automatically modulated accord-ing to amount of heat needed.

Why "Chancel"?

Dear Sir:

Let me thank you and the two writers in their articles on "A Chancel to Express Presbyterian Theology", and "A Setting for Reformed Worship" (October 1957). Both are excellent and timely. It is a pleasure to note that some Presbyterians are thinking of their own theology and history with architecture appropriate thereto. The recognition that God is speaking through His preached Word and giving blessings to his people through the Lord's Supper is fine. Then it is good to recognize that the ground about the table of the Lord is level with no division between clergy and laity.

But may I raise one question. Why then use the word "chancel" at all? This word is of Latin derivation, coming from the lattice-work which divided the section reserved for the clergy from that in which the lay people sat. The equivalent term in the Greek church is iconostasis, which refers to the doors adorned with icons separating the section in which the altar stands and into which only the clergy may enter from the nave where the laity are. Since there are no distinctions about the table of the Lord in the celebration of the Supper in a Presbyterian sanctuary why do Presbyterians use such terms as chancel or iconostasis? When the divisions are gone, what place is there for terms descriptive of these divisions? In order to have architecture fully appropriate for Presbyterian worship let us abolish also the term chancel.

The Bible and Racial Problems

Dear Sir

I noticed your editorial "You Supply the Text." (November, 1957) The following has been brought to my attention by several persons: "... and in that day there shall be no more the Canaanite in the house of the Lord of hosts." (Zechariah 14:21) These people went on to say, "And of course you know the 'Canaanite' refers to the Negro race." I don't "know it" but so is the claim.

Jack E. Van Liew Community Church Vaughn, Washington

Dear Sir

In December 1954 you published a list of scriptural references together with my verses "All One Body We," which was based on them. In response to your November editorial "You Supply the Text" may I excerpt: Acts 17:26-28 (The Negro is my brother/sister)—Genesis 4:9-10 (The answer is "yes"!)—I Corinthians 10:24 with Luke 10:29-37—Galatians

5:13-14 and 6:2-3 with Luke 10:29-37
—Malachi 2:10—Micah 4:4.

The Bible nowhere says, "Little Rockers, integrate the Negroes in your schools!" God does say, "Every man, love a Negro as yourself"—a dozen times from Leviticus 19:18 to James 2:8.

Donald B. Howard Claremont, New Hampshire

The Mormons

Dear Sir:

The October 1957 issue of your fine publication carries a review in the book section of the book God, Sex and Saints by George B. Arbaugh. . . . .

It somewhat startled me to see a review of the calibre of this one in your otherwise fine magazine. . . . I am inclined to believe that your reviewer, on this particular case, is even less informed than the author of the book he was reviewing regarding us Mormons.

In this age where Christian tolerance is being preached from all sides it appears to me to be a rather poor exhibit of journalism. If what your reviewer J. S. says is true, we are more to be pitied and felt sorry for than to be laughed at as he has done in this review.

Richard W. Jackson, A. I. A. Salt Lake City, Utah

Ministerial Housing

Dear Sirs:

I was particularly interested in your article "Housing Deductions for Clergymen" in the October 1957 issue of Church Management. I reread it several times.

It is indeed gratifying to know that some consideration is being given to ministers who provide their own home.

However, we find that some churches who pay their minister a flat salary hesitate to take official action and convert a part of the salary for housing allowance.

It may be that because of the old belief of separation of church and state, the trustees of the church do not understand and they are afraid that designation of any amount as rental of housing allowance would involve them in a controversy with Internal Revenue. Therefore I am wondering if this plan could be worked out:

On the Income Tax Return, a minister states the name of the employing church and the salary he receives. This could be verified any time. Now in addition to this information, could not the minister attach an official statement from his local bank stating that the minister is buying his own home through that particular bank and just what the mortgage payments are less the taxes. This information could also include a statement from his fuel dealer stating how much he spends for his fuel during the year.

Should the minister pay his own rent or if he is fortunate enough to own his home, he could present an official statement showing the rental value of the home, or the rent paid. In this way the government would know exactly what is being spent for housing maintenance and that could, it seems, constitute a claim for a deduction for housing allowance.

It is very embarrassing for ministers to ask their boards for such a statement when the ministers know that the issue is misunderstood, and it is also regrettable that ministers who really need this exemption so much should be deprived of this generous provision of home allowance just because it is not clear to some church boards and they hesitate to take action on this important matter.

Thanking you for any further information you might give, I am.

> William H. Hester Roxbury, Massachusetts

(Editorial Note: The law passed by Congress provides that the rental value of housing furnished a minister of religion or the housing allowance provided in lieu thereof shall be tax exempt. The Internal Revnue Service has no option but to require that there be a "housing allowance" in order to qualify under the law, but is as liberal as possible in defining this. It requires only that a resolution be passed stipulating that part of the clergyman's stipend is considered a housing allowance.

Unless such official action is taken by the board or agency employing a clergyman he cannot claim the exemption.

A clergyman need feel no embarrassment about asking a board to take such action since it is only designed to give equality of treatment to all ministers in the matter of taxation. Failure to provide a "housing allowance" to a clergyman who supplies his own housing or pays his own utility bills subjects him to discriminatory treatment in comparison with other ministers.

There is no danger of controversy with Internal Revenue. The regulations clearly provide that the allowance is deductible up to the amount actually expended in providing housing. If there is any question concerning a given expenditure it can be resolved by a simple conference with the nearest representative of Internal Revenue. He is there to help the taxpayers with just such a problem. A recent query, for example, was about whether an expenditure for lawn sod was deductible. It is, but a similar investment for garden seed wouldn't be. A lawn is a necessary adjunct to a house, as is a coat of paint; a garden is not essential.

Rulings on such points are easily obtained by simply claiming a deduction. If it isn't allowed, the clergyman pays the tax. No one will accuse him of cheating by claiming a benefit Congress has specifically provided for all ministers.

"American Seating Chairs add beauty and comfort...increase our attendance"

ANOTHER EXAMPLE OF AMERICAN SEATING'S HELPFUL SERVICES TO CHURCHES

Dr. W. Herschel Ford, pastor. First Baptist Church, says: "Our people are highly pleased with our beautiful and comfortable seats. No one could have given us better or more courteous service than American Seating Company. We highly recommend their seats and their service to every church."

W. J. Chesak, committee chairman for building the main auditorium, states: "It is highly important that a church furnish comfortable seating for its members. We feel that the seats installed by American Seating Company in our church have added to the beauty and comfort of our services, and have greatly increased the attendance."

Comfort goes to church with new American Seating Upholstered Individual Chairs.

Result: Even more beauty and dignity for church services, genuine seating comfort for worshipers, much lower noise level in the sanctuary . . . to say nothing of increased attendance!

In fact, that is why important churches, like the First Baptist Church of El Paso, Texas, value the importance of comfortable seating for members. It is also the reason why so many of America's fine churches consult the American Seating Company when planning seating for a new church, or when remodeling an existing church.

They know that American Seating offers a complete line of upholstered chairs, pewing, folding chairs, and church accessories . . . that all American Seating products are of the highest quality, and are built to the most exacting standards in the industry.

The Upholstered Individual Chairs, shown here in both the main auditorium and chapel of the First Baptist Church, are an excellent example of the benefits to be derived from specifying American Seating equipment.

These chairs, with pew ends on aisles, are designed especially for use in churches. Each has a deep-curved back with full-upholstered front panel, and hinged, soft-front, spring-arch seat. They provide comfort and modern style without sacrificing traditional church dignity.

Your church deserves the best. This means long-enduring American Seating furniture. For data, contact us today.

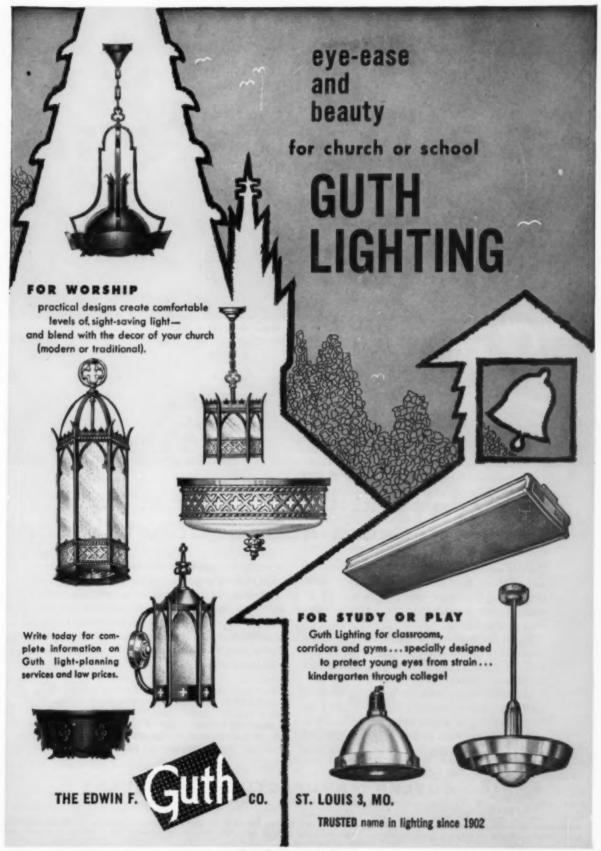

The chapel of this fine church is also equipped with American Seating Upholstered Individual Chairs.

A way around the high cost of church and school construction

The two structures pictured above are a convent and a school; both are quality buildings—both economical buildings—and for the same reasons. Yet only a trained eye can detect the common denominator.

These are Butler System buildings, which means that the basic supporting structure and roof are pre-engineered, mass-produced Butler metal components.

Since the Butler parts are precision-made to high standards of strength and durability—the basic building is sound and substantial. And since the Butler steel skeleton supports the roof and all other building loads and stresses, economical curtain walls can be utilized, employing any finishing material you desire.

Thus no two Butler System buildings need ever look alike. But they will resemble one another with respect to superior construction. Yet, you will find that a Butler costs no more—sometimes even less—than the most ordinary traditional construction.

There are several other important advantages to building the Butler way. Ask your nearby Butler Builder to show you the colorful sound slide film entitled "The Community Decides to Build." You'll find his name in the Yellow Pages of your phone book under "Buildings" or "Steel Buildings." Or write direct.

THE PROFESSIONAL JOURNAL OF THE CHURCHES

One Blood-One Dream-One World

T wo events have stirred our nation during the past three months. First, the racial segregation issue which came to a head in Little Rock, Arkansas; secondly, the launching of Sputnik I and II by Soviet Russia. They may seem far separated in significance and they really are, but in one sense they have a lot in common. They both reveal the stubborness which honestly resents all efforts to find anything good in those we do not like.

The fantastic theory of some segregationists that God has consciously divided humanity into preferred and non-preferred classifications parallels the concepts held by many in our land that mechanical and industrial genius is confined to the western world. American engineers of a generation ago who visited Russia reported with amusement that that land could never be in industrial competition with the United States because the peasants could not even change an auto tire. We now find that we are facing a nation of scientists with an educational system which is, in some respects, better than our own.

Back of both of these instances—the race struggle and the flying satellites, there is the age old concept that God has favored nations and preferred peoples.

When mankind refuses to accept the simple facts of life, history has a way of forcing truth upon it. It has been so demonstrated many times. Privileged individuals and privileged classes are of short duration. The boy born across the tracks becomes the business prince of the next generation. The bashful little colored girl in the church choir develops into the world famed soloist. While this is happening the crowns of monarchs are vanishing as their owners become wanderers upon the earth.

"The mills of God grind slowly." But they do grind. The truths we resist finally prove themselves. The United States of America, conscious of its power, has become somewhat of a braggart in the Councils of the world.

So sure have we been that we are the favored nation that we have entered the flabby age of our history. Less work. More play. Vulgar displays of wealth. Cheapening personal and public morals. These things characterize our age. Yet progress is usually stimulated by severity not luxury.

If gold alone can buy truth, we can control the wisdom of the world. But even gold cannot withstand the evolutionary processes of truth.

There is too much good in this big, wealthy, half-pagan, nation of ours to permit it to be destroyed because of blind spots in its social thinking. The time of redemption, we think, is at hand. Events of the past few months may be the eye-opener we need to recover our idealism and religious faith.

The Bishop Said a Mouthful

The House of Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church recently met in Sewanee, Tennessee, in connection with the one hundreth anniversary of the founding of the University of the South, which is affiliated with that Church. There was some criticism of the House of Bishops because it did not issue a pastoral letter regarding segregation. The Rt. Rev. Henry Knox Sherrill, presiding bishop, is reputed to have given this reply.

We have stated our position and we maintain that position. But it is a quite complicated and very delicate question and we feel that it would not be wise to pop off something drummed up at 3:00 A. M. Our pastors like to preach in their own way, instead of pastoral letters being sent out.

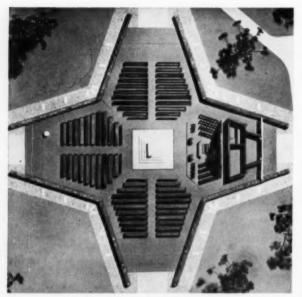

The italics in the above are ours. We know that there are many ministers in other denominations who wish that this attitude were contagious. They, too, like to select their own topics and preach their own sermons. It would be well to withhold many of their prepared discourses for special occasions.

There Is Always Another

The preacher was deeply engrossed when reminded by his secretary that he had a speaking engagement in a neighboring city. He rushed his preparation, grabbed a book from his desk to read on the train, and made a dash for the station. On the train he found that he had forgotten the manuscript of his address.

The book, however, interested him greatly. Every page gave him ideas, and he was soon writing notes on the inside covers. Some of the items he intended to insert in the address which he was trying to remember. The longer he read the more ideas were written down, and he had more ideas to supplement the original material. When he gave the ad-

Boys and Men Design a Chapel

66 think the new Chapel should be sort of holy."

"I want a feeling of space inside."
"The cross should be prominent."

The Chapel Planning Committee at Episcopal Academy, in Overbrook (near Philadelphia) read these statements with mixed emotions. They had asked the students at this boys' school, the nation's largest Episcopal day school, to express what they wished in the proposed new chapel. Over and over again from boys of all ages came the same desires differently expressed.

"It has to be simple."

"We want to feel a togetherness inside."

"It should have a steeple at least sixty-five feet tall to dominate the campus."

"Could we have a beautiful organ?"
Although Headmaster James H. McKee Quinn and the school's chaplain, the Reverend James A. McDowell, heartily agreed with these sentiments, and the committee with them, they were faced with other, more practical considerations.

With a budget of $350,000, how could they erect a building large enough to hold 800 boys at once, fulfilling at the same time these desires for spaciousness, a high steeple, fieldstone walls and other expensive items?

The Planning Committee composed

Episcopal Academy, Overbrook, Pennsylvania

Vincent G. Kling, Architect

There was only place on the school campus where this chapel could fit. Ideally, it must face buildings at either end of the campus and a main road—all at once! Future maintenance and upkeep must be considered.

of trustees, alumni, parents, faculty and students wrestled with their hopes and the grim realities. After much prayerful thought and discussion they finally formulated the requirements for the building so badly needed. (The present chapel is a frame building that was erected in 1924 as a "temporary" chapel.)

The new chapel, they agreed, should express the central role of religion in the life of the Academy. It should lend itself to easy movement to and from the short daily chapel service, yet be suitable also for the religious pageants and morality plays which are such an integral part of the Academy's program. It should be spacious and lofty and use the cross freely in its design. It should have the freshness, directness and simplicity of the young boy's attitude toward God and the world. It was to be called Christ Chapel.

As designed by Philadelphia architect Vincent G. Kling, Christ Chapel is in the shape of a Greek cross, with the altar in the center and the Academy family grouped around it in three transepts. Each of these has its own entrance. The fourth transept is occupied by pulpit, lectern, choir, organ and sacristy. The space is enclosed by a four-gables roof that rises to a lofty height (50 ft.) over the altar and is crowned by a steeple. Under the roof, embracing the transepts, are low walls of native field stone.

A cross suspended above the altar is bathed in natural light coming through the glass-enclosed steeple and an oculus. Natural light is also admitted through the band of glass between roof and walls. The gable ends, above the doors, are stained glass.

The interior design is composed of exposed laminated-wood structure, acoustical plaster ceiling, quarry tile floor, walnut pews and woodwork, and exposed stone walls. Outside, the roof is ribbed copper.

While construction of the chapel is estimated at $350,000, Episcopal's campaigners have set their sights on $400,000—a figure which includes the hoped-for organ. At the present rate of subscriptions, they may well succeed in raising the added funds needed for stained glass and for changes in the campus driveway, which now cuts up the area around the Christ Chapel site.

The fund drive is not without its excitement, for the contemporary design of Christ Chapel has given rise to some controversy among Episcopal Academy's friends. Objectors to the low walls and sweeping roof are told by enthusiasts of the design that "This is a building to shelter small boys, not a parish church."

To the occasional "traditionalist", who complains that the altar belongs "at the end of a church, not in the center", Chaplain McDowell has this to say:

"At the first Communion, Jesus Christ did not go to the far end of the room and turn His back on His disciples. He was in their midst."

Christ Chapel is planned especially for boys, and is a direct expression of what boys and young men of today want most in a chapel.

So the secret was out. Someone else had seen an advance copy of the book. He might as well confess the plagiarism and be humble. But his new friend did not give him the chance. He continued his enthusiastic endorsement.

"Yes, I know where you got it. There is only one place a man can get a message like that. That is down on his knees before God in prayer."

a floor cleaner that costs less than a Clarke

It's true, this charwoman's scrub brush costs less than a Clarke floor maintenance machine. Initial cost, that is. In the long run, of course, you pay far more to clean with a scrub brush than to invest in a Clarke. Clarke machines cut your maintenance bills more than any low-initial-cost cleaner. The versatile Clarke Floor Maintainer, for instance, not only drastically reduces labor costs, but does so much more cleaning so much better with less work and in less time. It scrubs, polishes, waxes, steel wools, buffs and grindskeeps your floors sparkling easily and economically.

No matter what your cleaning needs are, there's a Clarke machine that's just right for you-maintainers and wet-dry vacuum cleaners in a range of job-fitted sizes and the Clarke-A-matic combination cleaner for unusually large floor areas. Have your Clarke distributor show you.

Magic in the Printed Word

S IF THERE were magic in the impress of type, the I printed word conjures vital interest. To most folk, "I saw it in print," has stirring significance. As the printed word crystallizes creative thought, so is it a dynamic force in influencing thought-and arousing action.

Let the Printed Word Reinforce Your Efforts

PUBLICITY through printers' ink can work wonders in your church . . . in your parish . . . even far afield.

A Church Magazine of Your Own!

PUT ONE to work for you. Let it go to every member of your community. It not only tells the people what your church has done and plans to do, spiritually and socially, but it makes them think, talk, plan and work with you. It extends your influence, the grace and power of your church. It increases attendance and collections. Helpful in your endeavors to enlarge the kingdom of God, it builds a successful pastorship.

An Adventure In Understanding

Eschewing publicity, sensationalism and much talk, Wilson Bridge quietly exchanged pulpits with a man whose skin was a different shade, thereby demonstrating in action what many hold by conviction. This is an exciting story—a mission of good will, told in his own words.

Wilson Bridge

In the spring of 1957 my wife and I were discussing plans for our summer vacation. It had been suggested that we might be able to effect an exchange of manses and churches for the period of our vacation with one of our ministers in western Canada. But owing to circumstances over which he had no control the proposed exchange never materialized.

Several days later, whilst looking through some papers in my desk, and wondering where I might find another exchange possibility, I came across a copy of the Hood Theological Seminary Bulletin. This seminary, located at Salisbury in North Carolina, is the ministerial training college of the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church. The A.M.E. Zion Church is a Negro denomination which parallels the Methodist Church in the United States. Its membership is given as 525,000. It shares the distinctive Methodist emphasis in doctrine, worship, polity and program. The theological seminary at Salisbury is open to Christian men and women of all races. When I learned this from the bulletin it struck me as being the right spirit, and that was where I got the idea of a Negro-white exchange.

Making Arrangements

As I looked through the bulletin and noticed the names of members of the seminary board, I came across the name of the Rev. A. A. Perry, D.D., minister of the Goler Memorial Church in Winston-Salem, North Carolina. To me, he was just a name, and a minister of the A.M.E. Zion Church. But for some reason which I am unable to explain, I felt guided to write him, informing him that I would like to exchange manses and churches for the month of August, and asking if he would be interested. In his reply, Dr.

Perry stated that he liked the idea very much. He also liked Canadians because of the kindness he had received some years previously from people in Windsor, Ontario, when he was stranded in that city. But although the idea appealed to him, and he would have appreciated a trip to Canada, he had to decline; he had already made plans for his summer vacation. What he did do, however, was to place my letter before a group of Negro ministers who met at Livingstone College, Salisbury, two weeks later. A number of them were interested, but the one man who found it convenient to exchange for the month of August was the Rev. E. Raphael Michael of Little Rock A.M.E. Zion Church, Charlotte. He had served in the New England and New York Conferences, and was highly recommended by Dr. Perry, and by Bishop William J. Walls. senior Bishop of the A.M.E. Zion Church.

When I placed Mr. Michael's name befor the members of our church session they were enthusiastic about the idea. The fact that the color of a man's skin was black made no difference to them. "Go right ahead," they said, "and make the arrangements." One member of the session went so far as to say, "If by any chance I were to die while you are away,
I would be tickled pink to have the Negro minister conduct my funeral service." So having received the blessing of the church session I again wrote to Mr. Michael and we completed plans for the exchange of manses and churches for the month of August.

Of International Interest

When everything had been arranged to the satisfaction of both churches and ministers, Mr. Michael passed on the information to Dr. J. S. Nathaniel Tross, editor of The Charlotte Post. The very day on which the news was published in that newspaper it was picked up by the Associated Press, and the exchange became "news" from coast to coast. It was "news" because it was the first international interracial exchange of which North America had any knowledge.

Our first intimation of the fact that such an exchange was of international interest came over the radio at nine o'clock one morning when the announcer stated that a Negro minister from North Carolina and a white minister from Quebec were to exchange manses and churches for the period of their summer vacation. Throughout that day we received many phone calls from newspaper reporters in Canada and the United States. One of the first of these was the Ottawa correspondent for The Times of London, England. Three radio stations and one T.V. station also asked for interviews.

To some people it may seem rather foolish when I state that we gave careful consideration to these requests before consenting to be interviewed. There was good reason for this. There were many angles to what we were contemplating, and quite a bit of racial tension in the South at the time.

In each interview we were careful to point out both to the press and in my radio and T.V. interviews, that this exchange was not a campaign connected with the subject of racial relations. We were simply going on a mission of goodwill, and irrespective of the color of their skin the people of both races were "one in Christ Jesus." The whole thing was to be a venture of faith, both for the Michaels and ourselves; and it was in faith that we went to Charlotte and the Michaels came to Lachute.

The Exchange

My wife and I traveled to Charlotte by car, arriving there in the evening of Thursday, August 1st. The Rev. and Mrs. E. R. Michael, along with their two daughters, Vernoca, 12, and Margaret, 14, reached Lachute in the morning of Friday, August 2nd. As were were traveling by different routes we did not meet in the course of our journey, though we did make tentative plans to meet on our way home.

In a press interview given shortly before he left Charlotte, Mr. Michael said, "We have the best of the deal. The Bridges will have the heat of the South to contend with, and we will have the coolness of Quebec."

He was right! While we were to live in a small, six-roomed, wooden bungalow, with day temperatures in the high nineties for most of the time, and occasionally over the hundred mark, with humidity of eighty percent, the Michaels were to enjoy our spacious, brick-built, two story manse, with a climate at least fifteen degrees cooler, plus cool breezes.

After breakfast on Friday we were surprised to receive two colored visitors from Washington, a reporter and a photographer who had been sent down by the publishers of Ebony, a Negro magazine, the opposite number to Life. It was the job of these men to "cover" our first few days in Charlotte, including the Sunday services, and to find a contact who would keep them informed of public reaction to the idea during our month's stay. Other reporters and photographers were to do a similar thing for the Michael's during their stay in Quebec, thus providing a full coverage for Canadian and American papers and magazines.

During the next few days we visited a number of white and colored high schools in Charlotte. We also visited Carver College and Johnson C. Smith University, and Queen's College. We went on to Salisbury and visited Livingstone College, and Hood Theological Seminary. Livingstone is a liberal arts college with a class

"A" rating, and was named in honor of David Livingstone, the great and beloved Scottish explorer and missionary to Africa. It is interesting to note that at the time when Livingstone College was founded seventy-five years ago by Bishops Hood and Lomax, and other interested people, they were able to secure a charter without the word "race" or "Negro" in it. Thus the doors were left open for all youth without regard to race or creed. The college has grown with the years, and now its students come from every state in the United States, from Canada, from Central America, the West Indies, South America and Africa. Its present enrollment is more than seven hundred.

Hood Theological Seminary is the graduate school of theology. It was named after Bishop John Walker Hood, the cornerstone being laid in 1906. Through the years and through its doors, "an endless line of splendor," men and women, have gone out to serve. Bishops, teachers, missionaries, ministers and Christian education workers are numbered among its illustrious graduates.

Both of these institutions are located on the beautiful and spacious campus at Salisbury and are sponsored by the A.M.E. Zion Church. Dr. William J. Trent, whom were were privileged to meet, has been the forward-looking president of both institutions for the past thirty-two years.

The Church

The Little Rock A.M.E. Zion Church to whose people I had the privilege of ministering, is situated in a downtown section of Charlotte, in the midst of a Negro population. The manse is two miles or so from the church in a good middle class Negro neighborhood. We were the only white people there and no family could have been made more welcome or received more kindness than we did.

Although I have conducted divine worship and preached in churches of various denominations in the course of my ministry, this was the first time I had ever worshipped with a Negro congregation. To hear those people sing was always an inspiration. As one observed their faces it seemed that they sang with the spirit and with the understanding also. To preach to them was a heart-warming and unforgettable experience. The enthusiasm generated by their singing of the hymns, and the choir's singing of the Negro spirituals, seemed to find a further outlet during the sermon. Again and again they would call out, "Yes, brother," "Halleluiah" and "Praise the Lord."

The way in which they gave vent to their feelings did not disturb me in the least, for in the post war years I had had similar experiences when conducting evangelistic services in rural parts of the Old Country. On returning to my own church in September the service was a very tame affair when compared with what we had known in Charlotte.

Church Management: January 1958

Courte Hangement James 122

Church attendance on each of the four Sundays in Charlotte was excellent, even though the heat was most oppressive. The body of the church and the gallery were always filled, and on the fourth Sundaywhen a number of white people were present-some of the worshippers had to stand throughout the service. Never in all my life have I perspired so freely in a worship service as I did on those four Sundays. But like my wife and son I gradually became accustomed to it. Tropical-weight clothing did help somewhat, but the perspiration poured out just the same. If my inspiration had equaled my perspiration we might have had a revival.

The Other End

Up in Lachute, a town of about 9,000 people, the Michaels were well received. Our congregation had given them a great welcome, and had taken them not only into their homes but into their hearts.

Granted, they had the cooler climate. Some days it was a bit too cool, for they had to make use of the oil furnace in the manse to enable them to be warm and comfortable. But whatever coolness they experienced in the matter of climate was more than compensated for in the warmth of hospitality they received from our people. They were the only colored family in Lachute, but as Mr. Michael said to a press reporter, "Our color never made any difference wherever we went. There seemed to be no end to the dinners and suppers to which we were invited, and we enjoyed every minute of our stay. In my twenty-nine years as a minister I can honestly say that of all the churches in which I have preached no church ever gave me a greater welcome than the United Church of Canada in Lachute.'

Before the Michaels left for home our people arranged for an informal party on their behalf in the church hall, at which ministers of the various Protestant churches were present. Parting gifts of woolen blankets, made locally in Ayers' Mills, were given to the Michaels and broaches were presented to their daughters.

Social Life

We, like the Michaels, experienced much kindness and received parting gifts from the people of the Little Rock A.M.E. Zion Church. We also attended a number of social functions, including the silver wedding anniversary of two of the church members.

One of the social events given in our honor was a Sunday afternoon reception at the Y.W.C.A. in Charlotte. To this white and colored ministers were invited, and although at least eight colored ministers were present, we did not see any white ministers.

In the presence of a large gathering which included Dr. A. H. George, Dean of Johnson G. Smith University, Dr. Edward H. Brown, Director of Carver College, Dr. J. S. Nathaniel Tross, Editor of The Charlotte Post, and other prominent citizens, I was presented with a leather-bound Bible. This was suitably inscribed to commemorate our international interracial exchange, and to mark my twenty-one years as an ordained minister. The gift came as a great surprise and I shall always treasure it because it was given to me by the people of another race to whom I had gone as an ambassador of Christian goodwill.

Dr. J. S. Nathaniel Tross, in the course of his speech of welcome on behalf of the church and the city, described the event as "history in the making," "I am convinced," he went on to say, "that if similar exchanges could be effected between other ministers and churches in Canada and the United States, they would help toward a better understanding between our two races."

A lay member of the Roman Catholic Church (white) who met me on the street during the week recognized me from a picture he had seen in one of the local newspapers and engaged me in conversation. "Your ministry here," he said, "has been the best thing that could have happened to Charlotte. God bless you!"

A white minister whom I met later apologized for the fact that no white ministers had called to visit us, and for their absence from the reception. "Our people are not in favor of fraternizing with the Negroes," he said, "but in our own hearts we feel ashamed because we see a white minister from another country doing what we ought to have done long ago."

Our last Sunday in the Little Rock A.M.E. Zion church was an experience we shall always remember. The whole service from start to finish was a spiritual uplift. At the request of the people, the closing hymn was "Blest be the tie that binds," sung to the tune of Dennis. I have heard some good hymn singing in my time, especially by Welsh congregations, but I have never heard a congregation sing that hymn as the Negroes did in Charlotte. The grandparents of many of them had been slaves, and it just seemed as if the pent up hopes and aspirations of the years came to birth in the singing of that hymn. To look out on that throng of black faces, and to see amongst them a few white people of our own race served to remind us and them of our "oneness in Christ Jesus."

A Venture of Faith

As I stated at the beginning the whole undertaking was a venture of faith. Very much so, perhaps, when I tell you that the Michaels and ourselves have never been able to meet to compare experiences. We had arranged for "a get together" in Washington on the return journey, but during the last week Mr. Michael had to switch plans and return home by way of Poughkeepsie in New York State. We wish we could have met these good people with whom we were privileged to exchange manses and churches, for it was a great experience. Perhaps at some not too distant date this may be possible, for our people in Lachute and the people in Charlotte would like us to make a return visit. This, in brief, is our story. The Michaels and ourselves have tried to sow in good ground the seeds of love and understanding, in the faith that things of this nature will have a chance to grow.

THE INTERCHURCH CENTER,

New National Headquarters For Churches

Architects' presentation of the new $20,000,000 Interchurch Center now under construction in upper Manhattan, N.Y., overlooking the Hudson River. Hailed as a symbol of the growing movement toward cooperation among the churches, the block-long, 19-story building, next door to famed Riverside Church, will bouse the National Council of Churches, several denominational offices and a score of other church and interchurch agencies. Designed by Voorbees, Walker, Smith and Smith, of New York City; and Collens, Willis and Beckonert, of Boston, Mass., the structure will be ready for occupancy early in 1960. Its erection brings to fruition an effort begun 20 years ago to establish a national headquarters for the churches, and a central home for their cooperative enterprises. Among its unique facilities are a chapel for daily worship services and a religious exhibit room for rare manuscripts and other priceless heritages of the Protestant and Eastern Orthodox traditions.

Symbolic ground-breaking ceremonies took place on November 17.

Building Today

An address given by the to a conference of Church sponsored by the Chicago

the Churc

It is not so difficult to prophesy. That is, if the event is placed so far in the distance that you are sure you will not be around for checking purposes when the date arrives. In this period of rapid change and shaky foundations it is comparatively easy to get people to believe in fantastic futures. Perhaps the church buildings of today would have appeared fantastic to our eyes twenty-five years ago. I am playing cautious in this situation. Instead of boldly foretelling what things are to come, I am trying to predict the future by looking at the past and the present and assuming that the future will be the logical development from the past.

The same things which conditioned church building in the past and the present may possibly be the factors which will condition them in the future.

Churches Build for Their Programs

One of the first principles to guide us is the knowledge that local churches from earliest times have planned their buildings to fit their programs. The church building is a suit of clothes for the program. Individuals have many things in common. Most of us have two legs and two arms. But the variations are so important that we insist on clothes which not alone fit our bodies but also harmonize with our personalities. There probably is an average weight for a man forty years old, and there may be an average height for a man of the same age, yet we do not buy our clothes for the average but for our own bodies which probably are not the average.

It is interesting to see how Christian churches throughout history have erected their buildings to fit their programs.

Where did the first century Christians worship? They had no great churches. They met in the upper rooms in homes of affluent members. These rooms with dining tables were just what they needed for their services of fellowship, hymns, and prayer.

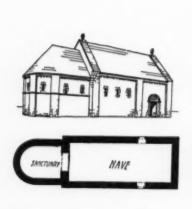

When, by decree of Constantine, Rome became Christian, the church buildings changed radically. Now they were the converted homes of wealthy Romans, with great halls. The churches of the period, known architecturally as Bascilican churches, follow the pattern of these square or rectangular residences, with a small circular apse at one end. In the apse sat the elders of the church. Before them were the members of the congregation. These churches never had baptistries within the walls. The candidates for baptism received the sacrament near the church entrance. After baptism, and not till then, were they permitted to enter the church. Today some denominations make christening part of the public service rather than an individual sacrament, so we then move the baptistery into the church

There is a fiction that churches of the Middle Ages were erected in the cruciform style, with transepts, by some divine miracle. Looked at from the sky the church took the form of the cross. There is nothing to substantiate a miracle. The transepts were added to churches for the simple reason that the congregations required more space. The first unit of the church to be erected was the rectangular nave. Next came the chancel. When the building became crowded an extension was added on one side. This became the first arm of the cross. Later when more space was needed the second addition was built to the other side. Then someone discovered that the building had the form of the cross. The theological significance was discovered later.

During the early years the churches of England, if located near monasteries, had a dual control. The clergy were responsible for the chancel. Chancels were built large enough for the brethren of the monastery to have a place in the daily prayers. The laymen of the church had the responsibility for the nave. This dual control led to some strange types of buildings. The visitor would see a church with a large chancel but a small nave; the next church might have a large nave and a small chancel. Because the naves were lay controlled and lay control meant usually control by the lords of the manor who owned the wealth, their needs took precedent. It is quite possible that the absence of seats in these churches was due to the custom of using the nave of the church for the organization of the hunt. The hunting lords took their dogs and horses into the nave while conferences were in progress. The clergy feared the invasions of the dogs in particular and barricaded the chancel with timbers so that they would not defile the altar or eat of the consecrated bread. Each of the two groups built for its own particular program.

Parapet towers on the churches were originally provided for defense against invasions. The narrow slots often seen in these towers were for the convenience of the archers. American churches are still imitating these churches. I have been in one Ohio community where four parapet towers ado'rn neighboring churches. They look like a massed defense against the powers of darkness.

Evolution of the Church in America

We can follow the history of church building in America by the term "cells." The early churchbuilding was a one-cell building. That was sufficient for the onecelled program. The church building was used for divine services and the preaching of the gospel. The one-room church building provided that cell.

Where the liturgical and Episcopalian churches settled the second cell, the sacristy or vestry was soon added. Up to the time of the Civil War the majority of churches were one or two-celled buildings. Following the war we saw a period of evangelism and the surprising growth of the Sunday school. The interiors of the churches began to take on a form which provided the best area for evangelistic preaching. That might mean a central pulpit and circular pews, everybody facing the minister. Evangelistic preaching became the main program of the churches, and the buildings were erected to fit that need.

By 1870 the need for educational space was recognized, and the Akron plan of educational building was evolved. As Marion Lawrence said, it seemed as if this building were a gift of God, it so well supplied the needs. We, today, may ridicule the plan, but it did follow the needs of the times. It fitted exactly the type of teaching of its day. Bishop Vincent insisted the building offered togetherness and yet separateness. Movement from assembly to classes was possible with a minimum of confusion.

Every church that could do so—and there were thousands of them—added another cell to its building. In 1900 the denominations introduced the first graded lessons for Sunday schools, and the Akron plan was theoretically obsolete from that time. But churches tried, with not much success, to use graded lessons in Akron plan buildings.

Next came the demand for social rooms. The new fancy idea of central heating encouraged this. If it was necessary to dig a hole in the ground for a furnace, why not build a larger one and have a room for kitchen, dining room, and other social activities? So another cell was added. That was for fellowship. This department has been expanded to include church parlors, game activities, and many other features.

This was followed with the introduction of the church office. The multi-celled church needed a center for administration. The minister became an executive. The office for the minister and his assistants must have laborsaving devices such as the typewriter, telephone, duplicator, folding machine, addressing machine, and others.

Since the programs of local churches are influenced by denominational practices, you will find similarity among buildings of the various fellowships. If the church belongs to the immersionist groups, it will need a baptismal pool; if it is an evangelistic group, the square room with the corner pulpit and a choir immediately back of the minister may best fit the program. If the denomination is liturgically minded, you will see an open chancel, the altar in place of the communion table and other features. It is still the program which influences the church building.

Conditioned by Population Trends

Today's churches are much conditioned by population trends. This was also true in the past, and I think that it will be true in the future. Church federations today are as much interested in population trends as are the public utilities. Two generations ago the first principle for church location was: "Build it on the square downtown." It is now common to see eight to ten churches around the downtown area. The changing situation has made their work difficult. The membership has moved away. There are always loyal oldtimers who stick by the church, but the day of most downtown churches is reaching its end.

No church federation or denomination would want to see a downtown area without a church. Even if the members are very few, the noble stone structure with its spire pointing to the sky has a mission. The orderly transfer of the downtown churches to the greener fields of the suburban areas is one of our big problems today and also one of our big opportunities.

To a sensitive personality the presence of old dilapidated, heavy masonry churches in a downtown area is most depressing. To the unthinking they seem to indicate that organized religion is decadent. What they really say is that a church built for one era is not satisfactory for a new age which makes different demands on the church buildings.

Our fathers cannot be too severely censured for believing that they should build churches to last for hundreds of years. They had the inspiration of the Middle Ages and knew that some European church buildings continued their inspiration during hundreds of years. I doubt if there is a church in our nation today which really thinks the building in which it worships will be suitable for use a hundred years hence. Our fathers did that. They thought that they built for eternity.

Cities are mobile institutions. Nationalistic movements spread across the city. There is a zoning, conscious or unconscious, of nationality and color. One minister who is just completing a church building told the author that he felt his particular denomination might have twenty years of usefulness in the community. This situation leads to the conviction that, in many instances, the most wise program is to build a church to serve but one generation.

Unquestionably we know more about population trends today than we did yesterday. Cities are taking steps toward population control. City planning has become a reality. The experiences of the leaders in city planning are most valuable to us in planning church locations. They should likewise be influential in determining the kind of building to be erected.

Great Gothic churches are inspirational, but the average community today needs rooms for Christian education more than it needs stone buttresses and lofty spires. The historic difference between the cathedral and the parish church should be the practice today even in the nonepiscopal fellowships. What the average church needs is good construction of an attractive building with the space and equipment necessary for the congregation to serve every age group in the church We feel, also, that it should have a resemblence to the traditional church building.

Financial Concerns

Church buildings in the future will be conditioned by financial conditions of their period, as they were in the past and as they are at the present time. There is a wide margin between the dreams of some congregations and the buildings which they really build. The reason is that churches are subject to economic laws as are individuals and other institutions.

No better illustration of this is available than our experiences in the post Second World War period. During the war many churches received memorial gifts and bequests. Because materials were not available, the actual building was post-poned until after the war. Architects thought in terms of pseudo Gothic, and many churches were planned in this style for erection when the materials were released.

When the war ended many of the controls also ended. Wages and materials were no longer under controlled prices. The cost of building mounted up rapidly. Hundreds of churches which had planned Gothic structures reconsidered. The Gothic blueprints were laid aside and colonial or contemporary took the place of the historic. Very few Gothic churches are being erected today. The great stimulus for the contemporary was not alone aesthetic but conditioned by the mounting costs of construction.

The years between 1870 and 1900 saw many great church buildings erected in the United States. They came at the time when the United States were beginning to think of themselves as a great nation. They sought to reflect prosperity through the buildings. These buildings were high, with decorated cornices. Plenty of "gingerbread" was added. The same extravagances were seen in the homes of the period. It must have been an era of easy money. The investments in some church buildings erected at that period put to shame our own churches whose members enjoy the high incomes of the present time.

The pressure of high prices has eliminated many of the decorative items of the early periods. The pressing need for functional space has lowered the walls, eliminated carvings of wood and stone, and decreased the percentage of churches with

It is evident, I think, that the financial situation will influence the churches of the future. If the earlier value of the dollar could be restored without lowering family incomes, we would see more expansive buildings than we are building in the present.

Expanding Program

I doubt very much if the program of the local church will be lessening in the future. Our children will find it necessary to add more cells-not taking away any that we have at the present time. If this is true, and most of you will agree it is, there is a wonderful argument for any congregation that is building a church today to secure sufficient real estate to take care of present needs plus those which will develop in the future. The buildings which are designed should be arranged so that it will be possible to add units without destroying the aesthetics of good architecture. If automobiles are to continually grow bigger and better, more and more parking space is going to be needed.

But will it happen? There is always the pessimist who is secretly praying that a bomb will be dropped upon the country before the time comes to pay his pledge for the new church. Yet most of us believe that the Church of Jesus Christ is going to grow and serve. If we could not have that faith you probably would not be reading Church Management, and I feel sure that I would not be writing this article.

For the Smaller Church:

We feel sure that the material presented on this and the pages through twenty-eight will be of especial interest to ministers and officials of smaller churches. It is a temptation to despair of any real progress because of the limitations which seem to be imposed on smaller churches—lack of trained leadership, lack of funds, sheer lack of numbers—but some churches have found a way. There is no excuse for giving up too soon, or for being content with rundown, antiquated equipment and buildings, or purely temporary quarters.

Don't Patch and Paste—Plan!

Herbert Morris

It was a joyful night for me when the Official Board met and decided to ask the Trustees how we could accelerate the completion of a part of the plans which had been drawn up a year ago. The people were now involved and wanted to see their dream church take form quickly. The old building had been good enough, but now they knew what it could look like and they were anxious to see the renovations completed. What made my heart quicken even more was the fact that we had accomplished so much without a special fund drive.

The idea was a carry-over from the days when I stopped work and returned to college to begin studying for the ministry. There wasn't much money in those days. I had a wife and child to support. Two assets had pulled us through—a plan, and my faith that Christ would find a way.

Several years later, faced with a student charge that boasted of a one hundred dollar item for maintenance in a budget which proved to be quite difficult to raise, I put this personal formula to work again for the church.

The history of the church showed that every year or so a special drive was put on to raise money for some maintenance cause that had to be taken care of at once. The roof was leaking, the furnace was broken down, or the organ refused to play.

As had been my case in college, there was no rich relative. We needed two things—a plan and faith that Christ would find a way.

When anyone offers an alternative suggestion to the patch and paste routine, he is quickly reminded of the money which would be involved in doing it the "right way." Money for such a venture is just not available. There seems to be no alternative but to patch, at least for the time being.

A survey of the records of your church may indicate, as mine did, that a great amount of money has been expended in this patching process with little or nothing to show for it.

If so, your church may need a plan.

When congregations begin to see their money being used wisely they will give more generously.

People are not willing to watch hundreds of dollars go down the drain to repair the old organ that has long since seen its day. They are willing to give hundreds of dollars to a new one that will offer a chance for silent prayer without the "clank-clank-clank" of the parts. They may not be happy about giving their money even to buy coal for the old furnace which does not heat right, even in warm weather, but they are willing to support a new one which will heat well in the middle of winter.

We could have just begun fixing. We could have replastered the ceiling over the lavatory and repainted the walls, or put the new oil furnace where the old one had been. We could have bought the cheapest organ available to replace the old pipe organ bought secondhand for one dollar around nineteen hundred. We didn't. We placed the oil burner where it would not be in the way of our new rooms even though we didn't have the money to build those rooms at the moment. We put heat in for the new rooms at the same time we put the radiators in for the rest of the church. When we built the new walls the radiators were already there, right where we wanted them. The lavatory was moved several feet in a more practical position and gave us enough room for two lavatories and a large church school room and chapel. This was not something that just happened. We planned it that way.

Our chancel was part of the plan as well. The old lectern was gradually replaced by a pulpit and lectern which matched the new altar and choir lofts. They all fit together though they were made at different times, as the money became available. We just followed the plan.

If someone wants to donate a sum of money to our church for building purposes we just ask them what part of the plan they would like to aid. Would you

Mr. Morris is minister of the Methodist Church in Mendham, New Jersey. like to give a room, or a hallway, or a bulletin board? They all have a place in the plan.

When you first start thinking this way you meet a little opposition. Some person is sure to ask, "Where are you going to get the money?" In a small church with a close budget it is a good question. It is necessary that the plans be drawn up by a committee who will plan with the needs of God's Kingdom in mind rather than the money available. The members need to ask themselves not how much can this town afford, but what kind of building should the church in our town have. What kind of church school facilities do we want for our children. What kind of sanctuary and what kind of furniture are needed in our church. What materials will last the longest and look the best. They need to draw up the plans without the worry of where the money will come from.

The committee must consider both the old timers in the community and the new-comers, and ask themselves what will please both best. Always they must sub-ordinate everything else to what will please God.

An architect needs to be asked to make drawings. These need to be displayed.

Those working with the plan will have to be constantly reminded that the drawings are merely drawings. Each time a person on the committee reminds the others that the church just does not have that kind of money, he should be politely but firmly reminded that this is a plan as to what we would like, not what we can afford. It may be necessary to change the plan. It may be necessary to scale it down, or discard it altogether. Nevertheless this committee should plan as they would like the church to be.

When our plan was ready we brought it to the Official Board and the Trustees. The Lay Leader explained it to the congregation. It has never been fully approved. There are little items that may never be approved—they are either too expensive or not practical. But the whole downstairs section of the plan were ap-

The First Church of the Nazarene
Des Plaines, Illinois

Robert Stauber, Architect

The congregation of the First Church of the Nazarene, Des Plaines, Illinois, has built a church that is architecturally designed on a budget equal to that used in building an average home. The Rev. Russell L. Carlson is pastor and the Rev. Mark R. Moore is District Superintendent of the Chicago Central District where the church is located.

Small but efficiently compact with provision for growth and all the essential requirements for satisfactory church housing in this suburban community west of Chicago, the structure is the work of Architect Robert Stauber, also of Des Plaines, whose design and engineering cost-cutting solutions have given the congregation a church that is an architectural asset to the community.

The building was erected with all essential features, except those that could be completed by the men of the congregation in their spare time, for a cost of approximately $11,000. Volunteers have done the interior at an additional outlay to the church of approximately $6,000, making a total outlay of $17,000, far under costs of comparable construction in the area.

The church uses an attractive combination of brick and redwood on the exterior, has large areas of glass, and is church-like in feeling and appearance. One of the ideas the architect employed was to align first floor and basement windows, giving the building a look of added height. Then by using a structural design known as scissors truss, the architect added eight feet of height to the interior without increasing the cost, and gave the more desirable pointed ceiling to the auditorium, improving acoustics.

The new church building has had an inspirational effect upon members of the congregation in many ways, as well as an effect upon the community as a whole. Already the congregation has doubled in size, its constituency now numbering about 150 persons. It is entirely self supporting, although when the church started in 1950 with 10 charter members, services were held in a rented hall and church expenses paid out of district funds.

There is a small book-lined study off the puplit, a full basement with five Sunday school rooms, including a large meeting room for the Young People's Society, a furnace room, and work shop space for mailing and mimeographing, two lavatories, and an adequate corridor with the stairway from the first floor at one end and an exit door to the outside parking area at the back.

The church auditorium has warm air baseboard heating, and air conditioning can eventually be installed with minimum changes although the large casement windows on two sides of the auditorium have kept the church comfortable even in the warmest weather, using a portable fan.

Large double oak doors at the front and side and a third door at the north end of the auditorium permit maximum safety. The building meets all building code requirements, which are stringent for this type of structure in the area. Oak floors have been installed in the auditorium and entire first floor, and these will eventually be carpeted and new church furnishings purchased. Interior walls are a neutral pastel shade. An attractive entrance vestibule has been provided and members linger here to talk after services.

The church hopes eventually to install a complete kitchen in the basement area which will improve facilities for church entertaining, club and community gatherings, etc.

Naturally, not an inch of space has been wasted in designing this low-cost church. For example, a cloak room has been built around the soil stack which ordinarily might just be boxed in and represent unused space.

With an area of 1450 square feet on each floor, The First Church of the Nazarene in Des Plaines is on a site approximately 100' x 126', so there is some room to expand as more space is needed while continuing to provide for limited off-street parking.

They Worship in Steel

The Huntly Memorial Baptist Church, Niles, Michigan

Steel and its direct ancestor, iron, are old materials; yet steel is as modern as today. We see it structurally in the tallest skyscrapers, or in the latest building development, curtain wall construction.

So it was no wonder that two years ago in February, in Baron Lake, Niles, Michigan, when a group of twenty-three people met to plan for a new Baptist church, steel should come into the picture.

This is the background and what happened. Before the new church was built the congregation used a local elementary school for Sunday services during the spring and summer months.

During this period the organizing group investigated several types of prefabricated buildings that might be suitable for a chapel. All were beyond the resources of the congregation, which compelled a look elsewhere.

Then came a happy suggestion. At a meeting of the Church Extension Committee of the American Baptist Convention, a member asked us to consider an Armco Steel building of Steelox (steelpaneled) construction. I learned of school buildings constructed of this material near Dewitt, Michigan, and went there to study them.

I was favorably impressed by what I saw, so much so that later I traveled to Middletown, Ohio, home of the manufacturers of Armco steel buildings. Here I visited a church or two, saw a number of attractive steel homes, and a handsome community center of steel-paneled construction.

I returned from this visit convinced that this was a most promising material for a suitable chapel in which our people could worship in dignified and comfortable surroundings.

The next step was to call a meeting of the building committee to discuss the project. All the members agreed that we had enough practical evidence to go on. They also liked the idea of their being one of the first congregations in Michigan to pioneer in this relatively new field of steel-paneled construction.

Through the efforts of the Reverend Ray McCoy and several members an excellent floor plan was designed, which led to the present building. It is 28 by 60 feet, has perimeter oil heat, two rest rooms, kitchen facilities, and seating accommodations for 175. The interior walls are paneled in Phillipine mahogany with batt type insulation in the sides and in the ceiling. The steeple is stainless steel and aluminum, built by a Niles, Michigan, contractor.

The steel-paneled building was so simple to erect that it was put up by volunteer labor. The only skilled workmen needed were to lay the foundation and concrete basement floor and install the heating system.

The new building is very easily heated and, from experience so far, maintenance cost will be exceptionally low. Everyone who has entered the chapel remarks enthusiastically of its quiet beauty and dignity.

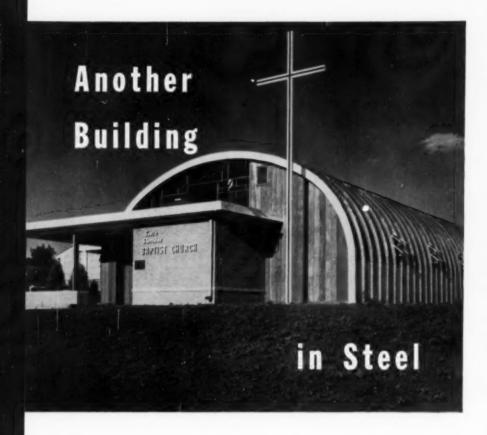

Total cost of the building, finished and ready for use was a modest $11,500. Furniture came to $3,700, which made the total cost $15,200.

We feel that we have one of the finest little chapels in the area. The congregation is happy with it, have called their own first full time pastor, and the work of the church is progressing satisfactorily.

The new church was named the Huntly Memorial Baptist Church, and was sponsored jointly by The First Baptist Church of Niles, Michigan, the Department of Church Extension of the Michigan Baptist Convention, and the Church Extension Department of the Home Mission Society of New York.

Building a completely new house of worship for the price of a small house is the record of the South Sheridan Baptist Church, Denver, Colorado.

The Rev. Clifford Morton, pastor, reports that the entire church was put up at a total cost of $13,500 through using the time, labor, and money saving advantages of a pre-engineered trussless steel building manufactured by the Wonder Building Corporation of America, Chicago. Approximately $9,000 was spent on cost of materials, and $4,500 for labor. Mr. Morton adds, "If the time element had not been important, we would have used donated labor, thereby cutting our labor cost in half. As it was, the Wonder Building structure itself was erected in only three weeks."

The new steel church measures 32' x 70', with an additional nine-foot front section of brick which houses a "cry room." Seating capacity is normally 275, but 300 can be seated if necessary.

Two 9' x 9' rooms were built on either side of the choir loft, at the rear of the building. The cement slab foundation was covered over with rubber tile. Interior walls are of mahogany panels.

Perimeter heating of the building allowed ducts to be put out of sight between the mahogany interior walls and the outside steel shell. This added to the beauty of the church, yet took advantage of its structural factors.

The church also took advantage of the Wonder Building structure's curved roof by applying a sprayed-on insulation which not only functions as a weather barrier but helps acoustically.

The new church is connected with a Sunday school annex by means of an open-air breezeway, lined in redwood. The annex, an older structure, serves as a chapel and Sunday school. Young people's and adult departments meet in the new auditorium and side rooms.

Mr. Morton explained that the Wonder Building structure was chosen to house the new sanctuary "because it seemed to perfectly meet our needs of erecting a suitable worship place in the least amount of time and at a minimum expense, without sacrificing beauty, utility, and function."

"We believe we have saved from $10,000 to $30,000 over other buildings that we had taken into consideration," he added.

Future plans call for using the new building as a recreation center and banquet hall, thereby adding to its versatility and flexibility. South Sheridan Baptist Church Denver, Colorado

We Built the Church

Albert M. Wright

66] t just can't be done," sadly moaned an elder after hearing a deacon's plea that we ought to get started on our building program. "We've waited too long now," the deacon begged at the official board meeting.

It was true that $50,000 had been accumulated over a period of 30 years. A small memorial of $12.96 given in 1918 for two World War I members increased by contributions and interest to a sizeable amount.

The demand for a new church had become almost an obsession for some of the members. A number of older folks making various contributions never lived to behold the reward of their efforts. A number of others feared they would not see the goal of their striving. Suppers were held, bake sales sponsored, individual contributions made and donations received from friends of the church, but every year the discouraging conclusion was reached by the official board that a congregation of three hundred members could not afford a $200,000 church with less than half the needed cash on hand.

Official action was taken in 1949 to make inquiry about the availability of steel for church construction, but after the assurance was given by government authorities that steel for such purpose was available, the more conservative members of the board feared the lack of financial ability to carry out the project. Such matters as contractor's commission, cost of labor, rising prices of all materials, and burdensome debt dampened the ardor of the most enthusiastic.

Someone proposed that possibly the members of the church could save money on the construction expenses by doing some of the actual work themselves. Fortunately for the church an elder who was a retired contractor and lumber mill owner ventured, "I'll be responsible for the overall planning and supervision if you fellows will back me up and will agree to install the plumbing and electrical work, and will do the labor I call for. I'll not charge the church a cent, and, furthermore, I'll do my share in swelling the contributions at the dedication service.

After a stunned silence, another elder with some plumbing and electrical construction experience interjected, "Well, if Elmer is willing to go that far, I'll be responsible for the plumbing and electrical wiring within limitations imposed by the city code for such matters.'

These contributions of effort encouraged other promises of labor such as digging, cementing, sanding, plastering and odd iobs.

A total sum of about $53,000 in cash, bonds and savings was reported available in the early spring of 1951. An offer of $10,000 for the old church property increased the zeal to get the construction started. Rather hesitantly and with trepidation the building committee appointed by the pastor set the date of August 5th for the ground breaking ceremony.

The long awaited day having arrived the congregation in a body marched from the old church the half block to the new site. At the close of the Morning Worship Service the pastor and choir in chancel robes led the procession. The neighboring

- with a liberal dose of "do it yourself"

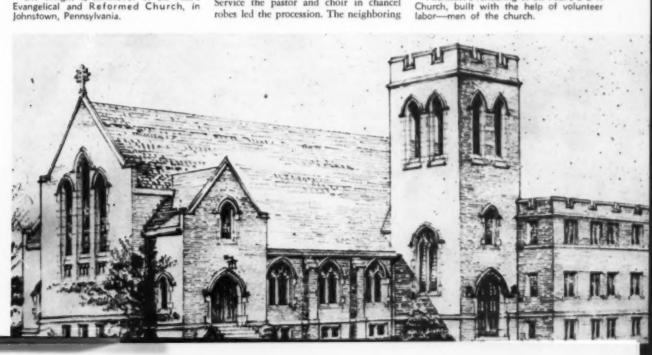

Lutheran congregation across the street from the new church site sang, "Onward Christian Soldiers," as the procession approached.

News photographers and reporters from the Johnstown papers were on hand. The twelve living charter members of the congregation were given the honor of unitedly pulling the ribbon attached to a shovel for officially breaking the ground. A number of members with movie cameras took pictures of the proceedings. One member has a complete film of the church building program from ground breaking to dedication. The varied scenes have been woven into a continuous film.

Most of the excavating work was done with a bulldozer and a few trucks to haul away the dirt. All shovel work was done by men and boys of the church. This same group of local helpers constructed the footer according to plans drawn up by Bolton and Sons, architects from Philadelphia. Elder Elmer Deeter, who sadly enough departed this life only two weeks after the dedication, was responsible for all measurements and for ordering of materials. The surveying and leveling was done by Elder Harry Bennett, an engineer with the Bethlehem Steel Company.

Mixed cement for the basement floor was hauled in truck drums from a local establishment to the church where forms were constructed previously by interested helpers. Each evening at least a dozen men, after their own labors for the day, leveled the cement dumped into the forms during the afternoon. As soon as rough floor boards could be laid across the foundation, the local helpers cut pipes for the heating system, assembled the automatic gas furnace, constructed underground drains and filled in materials behind the cement block walls. All jobs such as unloading blocks, bricks, pipes and lumber were performed by men of the church.

Professional help was required for construction of steel framework, brick casing, plastering in the main auditorium, construction of permanent woodwork, roofing and spouting. A couple of young men with pattern making experience carved all the woodwork for window frames and pipe organ grilles.

The cornerstone laying ceremony took place June 22, 1952, less than a year after ground breaking. Again a ceremony was made out of this phase of the construction. Newspaper reporters and photographers were again invited to be present. Some denominational officials were also present and took part in the ceremony.

Our church treasurer estimated that about $50,000 worth of labor by local free and voluntary help went into the construction of St. Paul's Evangelical and Reformed Church in Johnstown, Pennsylvania.

The plastering and cementing of the basement, cementing of steps inside and outside the church, assembling of steel framework for stairways, constructing of cement walks and leveling and seeding of the lawn were all done without charge by local members.

The dedication service was held June 7, 1953. A few weeks before the event took place, from thirty to forty men, women, boys and girls of the church as well as a number of visitors sanded and varnished the floors, windows and doors. Two days before the ceremony of dedication men of the church fastened the pews to the floor. The church was humming with activity every weekday night for nearly a month before the eventful day. Many nights the church was lighted past the midnight hour because some folks wanted to finish the task at hand.

No one will ever know exactly how much local labor was donated, nor will anyone be able to completely evaluate the spiritual values derived from the labors. A short time after dedication one of the most active laborers was heard to remark, "Before this thing began I was mildly interested in the church but now I feel that I really belong to it and it is a part of

The actual cash paid out for the construction amounted to $113,000. The amount on hand at beginning of erection was $53,000, with the sum of $10,000 given at dedication and $10,000 received for the old church, which was sold to a small local independent group of worshippers. Forty thousand dollars were borrowed from a local bank at 4½% interest with the rate dropping to 4% after the principal was reduced to $30,000. Repayments amount to $2000 plus interest every six months. Donations, repayments and special contributions have already reduced the debt to $17,000, which the church hopes to repay within the next three to five years.

Attendance at worship services and church school has about doubled in relation to what it was before building the new church. The membership is quite unanimous in agreement that the new church could not have been built for several years had it not been for the volunteer work by members of the congregation. The pastor is quite certain that there has been constructed more than a building. The laborer's report of what he had gotten out of the venture in a keener sense of "belonging" articulated the thoughts and feeling of many others as well.

It is very doubtful whether St. Paul's Evangelical and Reformed Congregation at Johnstown, Pennsylvania, would have today a church evaluated by bankers, real estate agents and insurance people at $200,000 if it had not been for the thousands of dollars saved by the labor of local people.

Save — and Be Safe! E. C. Landrum

"H arwinton Congregational Church, one of Connecticut's most beautiful old churches was a heap of smouldering ruins after being struck by lightning."

"Four story science building was totally destroyed in a $500,000 blaze at Davis and Elkins College."

"Seventy-five year old First Methodist Church of Raleigh, North Carolina, exploded into complete ruins after being struck by lightning."

"Knox Presbyterian Church in Dallas lost its steeple to lightning."

The total loss in these four acts of destruction totaled over one million dollars. Yet this was just a small part of the disaster and tragedy that occur each year from coast to coast due to lightning.

The real tragedy is that each of these fires could have been prevented cheaply and efficiently.

The days of the horse and buggy salesman who peddled his lightning rods from farm house to farm house may be a thing of the past; nevertheless, lightning remains the number one cause of church fires.

Approximately 400 lives are lost to lightning annually with overall property damage mounting to over $35,000,000, according to the National Board of Fire Underwriters. The NFPA states that there are few causes against which so reliable a defense is available as lightning rendered impotent by protection systems properly made and properly installed.

Certain systems entitle churches to a rate credit or reduction in insurance cost. For example, the First Presbyterian Church in Dallas recently paid for lightning arrestors the premium refund from a five-year policy, and in addition, had a nice cash balance left. This has been true of other churches also. Some companies will even allow churches to pay for protection systems in annual installments coming from their premium savings.

Many people ask the question, "Why does lightning strike and how do the arrestors help?" Lightning as we see it is the result of a charge of electricity in the earth attracting an opposite charge in the clouds. Besides being millions of times larger and containing a force five to ten times as powerful as an atomic bomb, the earth and clouds constantly are being charged with more electricity from the turbulence of storms. As the earth and clouds build up this terrific charge, they reach the point where there is sufficient energy to jump the gap, thus the lightning stroke.

As static electricity accumulates in a building, it has no way of escaping but continues to build up until it can jump the gap between the building and cloud. In making the jump a tremendous explosive force and terrific heat are created which tear up or set fire to the buildings.

Modern lightning arrestors discharge this static electricity as it accumulates, draining it off gradually, continuously and safely, thus eliminating the explosive discharge which does the damage.

Most protection systems are designed and manufactured under specifications of Underwriters Laboratories Inc., as are most electrical and gas appliances and firefighting equipment. The Laboratory also sets installation specifications. A Master Label is issued for installations done by approved concerns.

These systems are usually made of copper or aluminum materials designed to last the lifetime of the building. However, a check of the connections and the system in general should be made periodically and always after building repairs. Any additions to the building are not covered by the original system. Lightning could strike the new section and destroy the entire building.

Mr. Landrum is business manager of the First Presbyterian Church, Dallas, Texas.

Making a Christian Will

"I Give... Devise...

Bequeath

Christian Stewardship

The church, too, has a vital both spiritual and material making of wills. According to as

J. Homer Magee

In the quiet of his home a man, seated at a desk, is studying some papers and documents spread out before him. After a while, his expression thoughtful and serious, he takes up a pen and begins to

"I give, devise and bequeath. . ."

In a book-lined office a gray-haired woman sits across a mahogany desk from her attorney and reads over a legal document which he has just finished drawing up for her.

"I give, devise and bequeath. . ."

Scenes like these, involving men and women from all walks of life, are being enacted more frequently than ever before in the United States as a result of a new awakening to the importance of making wills.

These people are enjoying a unique and vital experience, performing a proud and important act. With a few strokes of a pen they determine the disposition of possessions accumulated in a lifetime. As makers of wills, they are meeting squarely their obligation to pass on their worldly possessions in a way that will most benefit their successors, their society, and the institutions in which they have believed.

They know that only through a properly executed will can they express their wishes as to how their possessions are to be used after death in providing for loved ones and dependents; that only through their wills can they perpetuate the special interests that they have had faith in and worked for in their lifetimes.

Their wills are also witnesses to their lives and characters. As Jacob M. Lashly has put it: "A will speaks from the moment of death of the testator and constitutes the last revealing expression of his personality which he shall ever be privileged to project on this earth."

The church, too, has a vital interestboth spiritual and material-in the making of wills. According to an estimate reported by Dr. S. C. Eastvold of Pacific Lutheran College, about 95% of wills drawn omit bequests for Christian causes. This surely indicates that many men and women who live pious lives and die without making bequests to the church have not clearly understood their stewardship responsibilities in this world.

To the fully informed and spiritually conscious Christian, the making of a will is bound up with the idea of stewardship. This means an awareness that God is the owner of all material possessions and that man is the trustee. To such Christians, gratitude to God for the gift of life, for success on this earth, for the promise of eternal life . . . leads naturally to making a will that conforms with God's will.

They realize also that to stop their support of Christian enterprises at death may seriously affect the work which they enjoyed and supported in the course of their Clearly, much more needs to be done yet to awaken more Christians to the disadvantatges of intestacy-dying without leaving a valid will-and to their obligation to make a Christian will.

According to findings of a new survey released recently by the National Council of Churches, over $100,000,000 has been given in bequests to U. S. Protestant churches and church institutions in the past 10 years—which strikingly reveals the potential that can be reached. And, remember, this amount has been derived from less than 5% of the wills that have been made and probated.

What a mighty power for good could be unleashed in the world today if every Christian remembered the church in his or her will!

"I give, devise and bequeath. . ."

Dr. Magee is Director of the Committee on Wills, Bequests and Gifts of the Methodist Church.

Disadvantages of Intestacy

Let us consider now those who will never write these words into a valid will. Such people will die "intestate." One often sees legal notices to that effect in the newspapers. More than half of the men and women in this country die intestate, we are told.

An increasingly large number of property owners are widows with the responsibility of administering large or small estates, or unmarried business women without immediate family responsibilities. By and large they have a deep concern for Christian enterprises, yet they are reticent about making wills. And there is no provision in law whereby the church can benefit, unless this is specifically provided for in a valid will.

The largest percentage of property owners who fail to make a valid will is found among individuals with small or moderate size estates. In many cases, such individuals have a greater need for a wellplanned will than do persons of more substantial wealth, just as it is more important for a person with a small income to avoid waste than for a person of greater

What, then, are the reasons for not making a will? One of the most frequent is a lack of understanding as to the disadvantage of intestacy. "If anything happens to me my family will know what to do." expresses a common attitude. Yet such individuals fail to realize that without a will the family has nothing to say about the disposition of the deceased's property. Under intestacy, the law divides the property according to fixed and often arbitrary rules that may have no relation to the special needs of the family at the time death occurs. It is quite hopeless, then, to report the verbally expressed wishes of the deceased, made before his or her death.

Simple procrastination often frustrates a person's good intentions to make a will. The time to do it usually seems to be somewhere off in the future. Making a will requires thinking out details, exercising good judgment, and a sound sense of justice, and it is easy to put off such problems until tomorrow.

But then there is a time when "to-morrow never comes," and the person forfeits his right to distribute his property as he wishes.

Another common cause for intestacy is a superstitious fear that making a will somehow invites an early death. But on the contrary there is more reason to suppose that a will promotes mental and physical health by relieving worries—thus increasing one's chances for a full and long life. It has also been said that people with Christian Wills live happier lives.

Still another cause of intestacy is a sense of inadequacy. The individual may feel that his or her estate is not yet large enough to warrant making a will. However, authorities say that any person worth $1000 or more may realize substantial benefits for the successors by executing a will.

Valid Wills

In some cases a will may be drawn, but then it turns out not to be valid. This may happen because certain legal formalities have not been adhered to in drawing up the will, or because the will was nullified by such subsequent events as, for example, marriage and the birth of a child.

To insure that a will is valid, a competent attorney should always be consulted regarding its preparation and revision. The cost of making a simple will is generally not more than $10 to $50, which is very small when compared with the losses that may be incurred by an improperly drawn will—or none at all.

Occasionally we read or hear about a distant relative who benefits unexpectedly because a property owner dies intestate. But those nearest and dearest to the deceased never benefit as fully as they should when there is no will. Injustices and much needless hardship often follow in the wake of intestacy.

The value of the deceased's property may also suffer under intestacy through such factors as higher taxes and expenses, or the forced liquidation of income—producing assets. A competent executor, who can only be appointed in the property owner's will, can not only conserve the value of the property, but relieve the survivors as well of the often burdensome task of managing the estate.

An example will illustrate some of the many disadvantages of intestacy. A man had three children by his first wife. She died and some years later he remarried. Subsequently, he and his second wife were involved in a fatal automobile accident. The husband was killed instantly and the wife died shortly afterward. The husband's estate included $25,000 in U. S. Savings Bonds, and $10,000 in life insurance. The wife was a registered co-owner of the bonds and the life insurance was payable outright to her.

Neither the husband nor the wife had a will. Consequently, since the wife actually survived her husband, she became entitled to outright ownership of the bonds, the life insurance proceeds, and her legal share of the other property. But since she died intestate and since the children were not hers, all this property went to distant relatives instead of the husband's children, who were left with only their legal portion of the remainder of the estate. This was an outcome which was farthest from the thoughts of the man and his wife.

Giving to the Kingdom

When a man has provided wisely and adequately for his family and dependents, his thoughts, with the perspective of eternity, turn to how he may invest some of the material fruits of his labors in eternal things. In Matthew 6:19-21, we read:

Preaching

We preach to build the Kingdom of our God

That man might see the Lord upon His throne

In heaven's palace high above the sod—

Before he ends beneath it sleeping prone.

Proclaim the Word and witness—we are told—

The good news that brings faith to hearts of men.

With knowledge and with learning we make bold

Our venture and expect the great

Our venture and expect the great "Amen":

"The existentialist theology
Demands involvement undivided by Another grandiose philosophy
Or of phenomena to simplify."

And so with words unknown to meet the test

And build our broken Babel towers best.

O. Gayle Miller

"Do not lay up for yourselves treasures on earth, where moth and rust consume and where thieves break in and steal, but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust consumes and where thieves do not break in and steal. For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also."

A Christian knows that it is in God's work that eternity shines. He realizes that the portion of his substance which he dedicates to the church and charitable institutions insures his lasting participation in the work of the kingdom of God.

Dr. Ralph Sockman has eloquently described the Christian's exchange of his worldly goods for coin of the spiritual realm: "And what is that coin, but life? Money that is invested in the welfare of immortal lives becomes thereby immortal. Money that goes into the making of character, the shaping of destinies; money that gives men hope and spells opportunity and lengthens day and wipes away tears, does not pass away. Money that contributes to the onward sweep of truth is as imperishable as truth itself. Treasure that is spent for the Kingdom of God is beyond the reach of moth and rust."

The needs of the church are great. As the divinely-chosen instrument of God's will on earth, it faces greater challenges today than perhaps ever before in its long history. It is engaged in a worldwide struggle with Communism and other materialistic ideologies for men's souls, and the outcome will surely determine the destiny of Christian civilization for many generations to come.

In the modern-day world, the church faces many other challenges. The rapid increase of population in this country, representing vastly more souls to be educated in Christian values, requires almost unlimited material as well as spiritual resources. It is estimated that about 70,000 churches and synagogues will be built or substantially altered in the next ten years at a cost of over $6 billion. In addition, a corresponding expansion is necessary for Sunday schools, parish houses, and related buildings.

The perpetual crusade on which the church is embarked requires dedicated and highly trained leaders. To meet this need, the church must build more colleges and expand the facilities at existing institutions.

As an institution founded by Jesus and guided by the Father of all men, the church actively engages in great enterprises whose aim is the benefit of all mankind. Through home and foreign missions, the church carries on the Ministry of Christ, bringing hope and comfort to the millions of the World, preaching salvation, and caring for the sick, the lame and the aged and unfortunate.

These are only a few of the many great causes in which an individual may invest himself through his Christian Will. In making a bequest, it should be noted that the unfettered gift is always the most valuable. Its usefulness should not be blunted by imposing rigid restriction, beyond the expression of a preference. In this rapidly changing world, the critical need or problem of one generation may be unimportant in the next, and the church can best move to meet strategic opportunities as they arise only if it has a reservoir of undesignated funds.

"I give, devise and bequeath..."

When a Christian has written these words into a Christian will, he has discharged fully his responsibilities to his family, to his society, and to the institutions which nourish his spiritually during his lifetime.

A Christian will, inspired by the loftiest living and thinking, is an expression of an individual's deepest spiritual nature.

A Christian will is simply an extension of Christian living.

When Misfortune Strikes

O. R. Tripp

H ow much could your pocketbook stand in the event of a long, expensive illness or accident? How long could and would your church pay your salary if you were totally disabled?

When injury or sickness strikes a minister, disabling him so that he cannot work, he becomes a double expense to his church. Any church feels an obligation to its leader, but there are limits to how much it can pay and how long it can continue financial assistance. Few churches today are in a position to pay two salaries when a substitute minister must be called to replace a disabled pastor. No church need ever face such a problem providing certain steps are taken in advance.

The answer to this problem is having some type of major disability insurance that (1) discharges the legal and normal obligation of a church body to provide financial assistance to a disabled minister and (2) provides an income for a minister disabled as a result of sickness or accident.

Could It Happen to You?

Statistics from a recent national survey indicate that it could. In fact, 3,500,000 Americans will experience a serious illness or suffer some type of mishaps which could cripple income as a result of long disability. The question is how long could you survive financially without an income? What sacrifices would you have to make?

Unlike some financial obligations which carry a specified time for payment, medical bills must be paid immediately. You know neither when to expect them nor how long they will last. Though our doctors are known for their patience and willingness to wait for payment, our hospitals must be paid promptly if they are to continue serving the needy.

How to Raise Money

The experiences in trying to raise cash for day-to-day living expenses and immediately due medical bills can be harrowing and disheartening. Lending institutions are reluctant to loan money when the only form of collateral is future earning power which in itself is debatable when the applicant is sick or disabled. If you have assets such as real property or can get additional help from your banker, take advantage of it. Relieving the strain of current bills will help to take the pressure off over the long pull.

Tax Deductions Help Some

The government provides one common relief which is available to everyone through medical deductions on income tax returns. Though these are a welcome blessing, they seldom are adequate to cover all expenses. The internal revenue department's book of regulations cannot begin to cover the hundreds of incidental expenses associated with a catastrophic illness or serious accident. Though some medical expenses are deductible, there is still no federal assistance to replace a lost income.

Where Does Your Church Board Stand?

Every church has a vital interest in its minister, not only as a spiritual leader but from an investment viewpoint as well. When a minister is called, most churches use a contract or other type of written agreement which states that he is to receive a certain salary for a specific number of years. Rarely do these agreements contain exclusions to absolve the church from the financial obligation to continue the minister's salary should he be disabled. The church is liable for salary continuation indefinitely. In the meantime a replacement must be brought in to fill the empty pulpit. When this happens, the regular minister becomes a double liability to his church. Let us see how a situation such as this develops.

Dr. Harvey Jackson, aged forty-five, was pastor of an average-sized congregation in a Midwestern church. He was married and the father of three children ranging in age from twelve to nineteen years. His church paid him an annual salary of $4,400, provided a twenty-eightyear-old manse and a small allowance for operation of his four-year-old automobile. Including gratuities and gifts, Dr. Jacksons' total income did not exceed $5,000 a year. He carried a less-than-adequate amount of life insurance, but perhaps all he could afford on a modest income.

When a serious illness struck, there was less than two hundred dollars in his savings account. Financial assistance for the eldest son Dan, a sophomore at an eastern college, had necessitated repeated withdrawals from the savings account. During the two years that Dan had been away at school there had been few months when there was a surplus in the family's budget and an opportunity to add to the savings. In addition to the older son, there was Paul in high school and Sandra, twelve, still in grade school.

Pastor Jackson was well liked by his congregation and looked upon as being a real asset to the church. In the nine years that he had served the pulpit, he had never once missed a Sunday due to illness. Toward the end of the year Dr. Jackson was unusually busy readying the next fiscal year's budget for presentation to the financial committee. In addition, Christmas was not far off and his work had increased accordingly in planning for upcoming special events. It was after a rehearsal for the Christmas play that Dr. lackson suffered a serious heart attack. He was rushed immediately to a hospital where for more than two weeks his life hung in the balance. For some time it was debatable whether he would ever serve his church again. The news of his fateful illness stunned the congregation.

In addition, there rose immediately the question of what the church should do during his convalescence providing there was a chance of his return, and how long the church could afford to continue his salary in the event that he could not preach again.

A second immediate problem was how to fill the vacancy in the pulpit. Fortunately the regional division of the church Dr. Jackson served was able to supply alternate ministers for a time at no additional cost to the church. At the most, however, this could only be a temporary arrangement. In the meantime Dr. Jackson's salary continued to be paid to help the family as much as possible with the staggering bills which began to accumulate. By March of the next year it was obvious that the pastor was fighting a losing battle. He would never preach again.

Now the board of deacons was squarely faced with a decisive problem. The regional district could no longer provide substitute ministers as new churches had to be filled. Dr. Jackson would have to be replaced by a permanent, salaried minister. Members of the board fully sympathized with the circumstances which had struck down their respected leader—there existed an unwritten sense of obligation: but as one trustee phrased it, "for how long and for how much?" Church budgets can be stretched only so far, and now the board had to pay two salaries for one job. They continued Dr. Jackson on the payroll at seventy-five percent of his usual salary, one-fourth being paid from a contingency fund of the regional district of the church. There was no alternativenothing like this had ever happened

After thirteen months as an invalid, unable to work, Dr. Jackson passed away. By this time the church was beginning to feel seriously the pinch of paying an additional salary. Circumstances had stalled a building program for at least two years, maybe more.

At a board meeting after Dr. Jackson's death, the members decided that some formal plan of salary continuation for a disabled minister was absolutely essential to the financial solvency of the church.

"We have adequate insurance on the church building itself, general liability to protect all of us, even a workman's compensation policy covering the janitor," one board member remarked, "yet we have no protection against the loss of our greatest asset—our minister. Instead of an asset, he becomes a liability in case of disability, and we have made no provision to insure against such a liability. The purchase of some kind of insurance that will provide disability income for our minister if totally disabled by sickness or accident will at least prevent us from paying two salaries for one job."

Insurance Protection Is the Answer

What, then, is the solution to this problem? How can the financial hardship to the church and the loss of income to the minister resulting from a major illness or accident be best lightened? The answer lies in major disability insurance. Protection of this type may be purchased by either the church or the minister. Since it benefits both parties, a joint arrangement can be worked out whereby both the minister and the church share in the cost of the protection.

What Is Major Disability Insurance?

Major disability protection guarantees to the policyholder (church or minister an amount of income in case of disability. The length of time the insuring company will pay and the amount it pays a disabled minister vary with each policy.

What Does It Cost?

At first glance, major disability or income protection insurance appears expensive. Yet when one considers what this protection is designed to do, the picture changes. As an example, take a minister with an annual income of $3,600. Suppose his income is insured at fifty percent of normal earnings. In only ten years he would receive $18,000 of insurance aid. The premiums he would have paid in, even if he had beeen making payments for half that time, would be only a fraction of the total value of the benefit received.

Major disability insurance is designed to help when it is needed most—when responsibilities and obligations are at their peak. It is also designed to last long enough to do the job thoroughly.

Few ministers can afford to insure against one hundred percent income loss. It is doubtful whether anyone would do so even if he had the means to afford it, for the odds against a disabling sickness or accident are too great in comparison with the investment required. On the other hand, premium payments that will assure an income of one-third, one-half, or two-thirds of the normal salary are well worth the investment.

Exactly how much disability insurance is needed varies with each minister. The matter of who purchases the policy-the church, the minister, or both-is also a determining factor. One method of establishing how much is needed is to ascertain how much a minister's family would require to live on in the event that the income should stop due to his disability. When setting up a program it is also a good idea to allow more than what is barely needed to cover day-to-day living expenses and set aside some additional income to meet medical expenses. Many ministers carry hospital and surgical protection in addition to major disability, while others are protected in this respect by a special rider attached to the major disability policy which provides for hospital and surgical care. Whichever plan is followed, the minister should try to arrive at the most satisfactory arrangement whereby his church is protected and he is protected as much as possible against financial hardship. As every case is different with respect to a minister's earning power and assets such as property and other benefits, social security and pension plans, it is important that any plan be selected on the basis of all these considerations. And since the interests of both an individual and an organization are involved in the purchase of this type of insurance, it is desirable to do so with the full knowledge of all parties concerned.

Utilities Are Deductible

Glenn D. Everett

A ruling has been made by the U. S. Internal Revenue Service that will be of benefit to many ministers.

The service has ruled that where a minister receives his parsonage rent-free but pays his own utilities—gas, water, electricity, heating oil, coal, bottled gas, etc.—he is entitled to deduct those expenditures for income tax purposes.

This will come as a pleasant surprise to many ministers since it wasn't specifically spelled out in the law Congress passed in 1954 which provided that ministers who furnished their own homes can deduct the allowance given them in lieu of

All that is necessary to take advantage of the new tax benefit is to have the board of trustees or other employing agency adopt a resolution setting aside part of the salary as an allowance for housing expenses. If ministers will step nimbly and get such a resolution passed, immediately, it can be made retroactive to January 1, 1955, and a refund on taxes paid in 1955 and 1956 can be requested.

The allowance will be deductible, of course, only to the extent actually spent in paying utility bills or for upkeep of the parsonage. Upkeep does not mean the purchase of furniture, expenditures for lawn mowing, or the services of a maid or handyman. However, such items as painting, fixing window screens, or capital improvements of any nature on the parsonage would be deductible as "maintenance and upkeep."

The new ruling was made in response to an inquiry to Internal Revenue from a Baptist minister in Holdenville, Okla. Noting that under the recent regulations concerning housing allowance in lieu of parsonage, utilities were considered a part of a minister's expense in providing his housing, he asked whether those ministers who got their parsonage rent-free but paid their own utilities and upkeep would be eligible for tax deductions.

The response of the Internal Revenue Service was as follows:

"It is our position that if a minister of the Gospel receives an allowance for utilities for a residence which he is provided by his church, such allowance is excludable from his gross income and exempt from Federal income tax to the extent that such allowance is actually expended for such utilities."

Inquiry in Washington discloses that the ruling applied to the Oklahoma minister will be followed in all such instances, although it has not yet been promulgated in printed form.

The resolution setting aside a part of a minister's salary as an allowance for utilities and parsonage upkeep need not provide that he be paid by separate check. All that Internal Revenue requires is that the sum be identifiable on the books as a separate item.

Meanwhile, an inquiry from a Washington, D. C. reader of Church Management discloses that apparently not all local collectors are aware of the fact that housing allowances can be made retroactive. They can. This has been definitely ascertained. Congress passed the law in 1954 and it became effective January 1, 1955, although it took two years to get the interpretive regulations out. The regulations definitely provide that such regulations can be made retroactive-if they are adopted by December 31, 1957-and ministers who have secured such resolutions from their present or previous employing agency can-and certainly should -file applications for refund of the taxes they paid.

They are entitled to the refund and should insist that their application be taken and be processed by the appropriate authorities. When it reaches the hands of someone who has read all the regulations, the refund will be granted.

Ministers should not be surprised if local collectors haven't yet heard of this new interpretation concerning deductibility of utilities. Many such regulations come out every month and it takes a while to codify them. Ministers will just have to go ahead and deduct the item on their 1957 returns and file a claim for 1955 and 1956 refunds.

In filing for refunds, those ministers who paid their utility bills by check can add up their check stubs. Those who paid by cash may have to confer with the utility companies to reconstruct their expenditures. Proof of payment must be available, if Internal Revenue asks for it. The allowance should, of course, be made large enough to cover the actual expenses.

This is not a tax loophole, in any sense. It simply represents an effort by the government to be fair. Until passage of the 1954 amendment, clergymen who received their parsonages rent-free with utilities paid enjoyed an advantage over ministers who served smaller churches or who were employed as chaplains of in administrative posts and had to furnish their own housing. The rental value of the parsonage was not taxable and this discrimination actually amounted to $100 to $150 a year in taxes. Congress remedied this by providing tax-exemption for housing allowances, and now, administratively, those who were in the middle, paying their utilities but getting the house rent-free, have also been covered. All ministers are now treated the same-retroactive to 1955.

Why not teach -

Manners in Church?

Millicent Tralle

Since good manners are the outward expression of inner fineness, and courtesy and kindness are expressions of the golden rule which comes from the Bible (Matthew 7:12), they are integral parts of Christian living. Why, then, shouldn't churches offer courses in small fry etiquette, starting with daily vacation Bible schools?

It is a sad commentary on homes that children generally are considered little monsters. Perhaps parents use the term affectionately, but sometimes teachers and others who work with children do not And they like children.

Parents, even the conscientious, seem to be failing to teach fundamental principles of common courtesy, much less respect for elders and kindness and consideration for all. The phrases "thank you," "please," and "excuse me" are all but obsolete. Observe children on television quiz shows, and it is the occasional child from the South who addresses the quiz master as "sir." Others use a flat "ves" or "no," and the reason they are not chewing gum while they talk is probably that it was taken away just before air time.

Manners are not something to be put on with party clothes, even if they could be bought in the store. They should be learned along with walking and talking. while learning is easy and fun, and good habits become as comfortable as old clothes. A girl whose parents realize and practice this never has to take a charm course; a boy doesn't require training in public speaking to become a successful business man. And both go through adolescence with a minimum of awkwardness and self-consciousness.

Too few parents recognize their failure, so it is up to the church and school to try to make up for the lack. Interestingly, the golden rule is not confined to Christianity. In different phraseology, it is a precept of nine other religions-Buddhism, Confucianism, Judaism, Hinduism, Jainism, Sikhism, Taoism, and Zoroastrianism.

Since we are concerned with children who attend Christian churches, let us talk about teaching them manners. And let me say first that they love the learning of them. I know from my classes in Small Fry Performers and Etiquette for Junior Misses. In the former, I teach only the phases of etiquette suitable to the age group. In the latter, the field broadens to include make-up and dress, behavior on dates, and the duties of hostess and guest.

Reasoned Discipline

In general, children enjoy doing the right thing, being told what is right and wrong, and what they should do. The person who enforces discipline is respected and obeyed, if enforcement is effected with calm reasonableness, without temper.

Even small children, who hop about like fleas, can be taught to stand quietly before their chairs until the teacher is seated, to rise after she does and follow. not precede, her out of the room. More important, they can be taught to keep quiet until addressed or given permission to speak. That some public schools permit talking in classrooms complicates a teacher's problems and is perhaps one reason for the scarcity of teachers. Interrupting while somebody else is talking is a common fault in adults and can only be minimized in their children, not eradicated. For "monkey see, monkey do," with original variations.

Once a child understands the why of a rule, he is willing to follow it. "You want people to like you, don't you? Then you must like them and make them like you by being courteous."

Common Courtesy

Being courteous is then broken down to the juvenile level. Even a four-year-old can understand that his name is his own special possession. He likes to be called by it. So he must use the name of the other person whenever speaking to him. In speaking to an adult he may use "ma'am" or "sir" as a variation.

Six-year-old Billie was one of my most apt pupils. His parents and grandparents were well-bred, so he had a firm foundation on which to build. After class one day, his mother offered to drive me home. Once out of the room, Billie ran ahead to open the outer door-a stubborn, heavy door. His mother started to help, and I put out a detaining hand and whispered, Watch."

Billie made it, bracing his handsome little body while we passed through. Then the car door, beaming proudly as he held it for me.

"And he's just a baby," she exclaimed. "But he's out of the nursery. You go through doors first now, if you want him to remember what he's learning."

Another mother asked me, "What in the world is Alfred trying to do with my chair at mealtime?'

"Hold it for you," and I laughed, remembering the tremulous faith required to seat myself on the chair I hoped an inexperienced seven-year-old would place

Farfetched teaching for the very young? Not at all. I grant you, it is often wasted because of lack of practice at home. As a teenager remarked, "I can't wait to see the expression on daddy's face when I get up as mother's friends come into the room, while he just lies there on his spine."

Church's Responsibility

The church can only try in this respect as it does in all other aspects of Christian training.

We encourage parents to bring children as young as six to worship services, and many even younger attend. It is a beautiful sight to see entire families praying together—provided the youngest members aren't wriggling and whispering to the distraction of all around them. It is hard, of course, for the small fry to curb animal spirits during a long service which sometimes tries the self-control of conditioned adults. But we did it, and they can, if taught from the crib.

Likewise, they can be taught not to shove ahead onto public conveyances, and never to take a seat if an adult must stand. Nor does such teaching stifle personality development, as some pseudo-child psychologists would have us believe.

Few adults know how to make introductions correctly, yet the rules are simple and unvarying. One of the class periods in which we have most fun is that in which the boys and girls take turns introducing and being introduced, playing parts ranging from mother to the bishop. Afterward, they know who is to be introduced to whom according to age and rank without stumbling.

Etiquette is much more than knowing which fork to use, for good manners are an integral part of good character. A well-bred person, of whatever age, is comfortable and welcome anywhere, with anybody, under any circumstances. Actually, parents would benefit from a course in small fry etiquette.

A ten-hour course in the daily vacation Bible school would prove to be valuable training in Christian living. It would ensure more orderly church-school classes in the winter, more worshipful church services the year round. Once tried, such a course would perhaps be sought by youth groups.

Already, with such a series of lessons not yet off the press, the superintendent of the winter weekday school in a large church has asked for them for an extracurricular course.

Small fry etiquette should be taught by a woman not only of Christian faith but of firm conviction that such lessons are valuable. She would probably be a woman whose mother gave her just such priceless training. And she would find that the basic rules are the same now as they were then. Interpreting them for children and sharing their enthusiasm for behaving like nice people would add another star to her heavenly crown and a warm glow in her human heart.

Courtesy old-fashioned? It's timeless. It's modern. And the modern church will eventually teach it as matter-of-factly as it teaches the catechism.

Findings in one denomination of interest to us all.

Women on Church Councils

Wade F. Hook

In a research project examining relevant data concerning the laymen who lead the lay activities in Lutheran congregations of the North and South Carolina synods of the United Lutheran Church in America, effort was made in one section of the study to determine the extent to which women are serving on church councils. The instrument used in securing information was a mimeographed questionnaire-schedule from six hundred and forty-six laymen, representing one hundred and two congregations with a total communicant membership of 26,233.

Seventy-one and five-tenths per cent of the respondents reported that a woman had never served on the church council

Sixteen and ninetenths per cent reported that a woman had at some time in the history of the congregation held a position on the church council. Eleven and six-tenths per cent did norreply to this particular item. The respondents were asked to indicate their reaction to a provision for having women serve in such a capacity. A summary of the results is given in Table I.

J. Emory Ackerman, reporting on replies from 1,308 churches of all denominations, reported in 1953 that comparatively few women serve on church councils in United Lutheran congregations. He studied certain practices and policies of the Seven largest denominations within the National Council of Christian Churches. He found that the Lutheran Church had the lowest percentage of women serving

City of 15,000. Church of 500 members. Congregation had approved building educational space, adding to present building. Educational leaders and some others displeased. Because of division of thought, committee withheld signing of fund raiser's contract. Consultant preached morning sermon which explained modern educational needs. Study showed that there was not room on lot to meet present needs. Working with committee recommended several substitute sites which would provide space for building and, in addition provide needed parking space. Site selected: committee signed contract: new building has been completed.

on church councils.1 It seems significant that in the present study over twenty per cent of the sample indicated a strong favorable attitude and that only five per cent expressed strong opposition. Twentytwo per cent had a preference for men only. This same study concluded that there are no significant differences in the attitudes of clergy and laymen toward church council membership for women. Attitudes expressed by one hundred and forty-six ministers in the two states indicate that approximately one-third of the ministers feel that a provision for having women serve on the church council would improve the efficiency of church administration. Slightly over one-third prefer to have only men in the role of church council member, and slightly over one-third are

Assuming that these are approximations of actual attitudes on the part of both ministers and laymen, more and more women may expect to be elected to terms of office on church councils in congregations of these synods in the future. As in other groups where office-holding is open to both sexes, it will be more difficult for a woman to gain and maintain the respect of group members. Prejudices, criticism and antagonism will be encountered. However, a new door is opening for women to contribute to the vitality of congregational life. Their areas of service have extended beyond "missionary society", church supper or Sunday School class. Many women have been prepared for their new tasks through experience and participation in ULOW, the gradual development of desirable traits and qualities in personality organization through associations and inter-relationships in Christian communities, and a deep commitment to Jesus Christ. As consecrated women assume this social role of church council member in congregations, it is likely that the congregational goals and objectives can be approached and realized more successfully.

- we are made for health

Joe Ross is a conversation companion with whom I sit down periodically to talk about some subject that interests us, in an effort to think our way through it. Sometimes he is the interrogator and listener and sometimes I am. He has the kind of horse-sense mind that pushes through the underbrush of words and makes you state your ideas so that they have some meaning. This appeals to me for I think too many people have their feet planted firmly on nothing.

As a hospital chaplain I have served in four major teaching hospitals and have spent more than twenty-five years working with physicians. This has given me a slant upon health problems and people that always interests Joe, for his is the layman's point of view—he is the consumer—he and people like him are paying the health bill. Therefore he needs to know what we—hospital and health people—are doing and thinking.

Problems of the Aging

We had been watching a professional football game on TV and drinking coffee. The play was ragged for pros, so our interest waned. Joe said, "See where Duke Medical School got a big grant from the but be conscious of the responsibility to make truth available to the needs of the people."

"It was a sneaky way of riding in your own biases," Joe needled me. "Who were you praying to . . . God or the audience?" "In his speech," I went on, ignoring his

"In his speech," I went on, ignoring his stiletto, "Dr. Burney said, 'As Dr. Dicks said in his prayer—we must add life to years as well as years to life—as we study the problems of aging."

"He probably had it in his manuscript anyway," Joe mumbled, still prodding me, which he enjoys doing when I'm on a bragging spree.

"Sure he had it in his speech, but it shows that he listens to the prayer before he gives a speech and it didn't hurt to link it up with the prayer. That's more than a lot of sermons do. . . . The dean of the medical school said in his remarks, "This grant will influence our teaching of medical students. In the past we have treated disease—in the future we will treat people.' He went on to say that practically nothing is known about the aging process, and that his father-in-law is ninety-one and in good health while he himself is sixty-five and feeling the push of time. He said, "The only difference that

We say of a person, 'He has reached a ripe old age,' and we usually mean that a person has survived a great number of years, but actually what does mere survival mean?"

"I used to attend meetings of administrators of church homes for the aged. They spent all their time talking about new buildings, dietary, nursing, and financial problems, and gave very little thought to what the hours and days meant to their residents," I said, following along Joe's line of thinking, for this was an old conviction of mine—that years for years' sake, just as health for health's sake, is meaningless.

"Of course," Joe went on, picking up my statement, "that observation would come with more meaning if it came from a person who is ninety—you with your youthful outlook of fifty-one can raise such questions"—he drove home the thrust ruthlessly.

"But," I protested, stung by his usual down-to-earth observation, "That's the time to work on the subject if it's to be dealt with. Think of the situation before you get into it. Then you can plan ahead, not only for survival physically but spiritually and emotionally as well. . . The Public Health Service to study the problems of aging."

"Yeah, a million and a half," I answered, somewhat preoccupied, "through the Department of Psychiatry. The first such grant ever made."

"Were you at the dinner when the grant was announced?"

"Yes, I did the prayin'. Dr. Leroy Burney, the U. S. Surgeon General, gave an excellent address in announcing the grant. First time I ever had my invocation quoted in the main address."

"Well, it isn't quite quoting a text, but I suppose it does give something of the impression of divine approval to quote a prayer in your speech. What was the quote, as if you weren't going to tell me anyway," Joe chuckled, but I could tell that he was interested—and I had intended to tell him, whether he wanted to hear it or not.

"In the invocation I prayed, 'May we not only seek to add years to life, but be conscious of the need to add life to years; may we not only seek to discover truth, we're certain of is that he is a Democrat and I'm a Republican."

"That could be the deciding factor," Joe chuckled. "I'm sure that politics ages many a good man prematurely. . . ." We were thoughtfully preoccupied, each with his own ideas; then Joe added, "Didn't you quote somebody as saying that 'age is not determined so much by the number of years over your head as by the number of colds through your head?"

"Yes, the point being that it is not what we do that ages us so much as it is the emotional wear and tear of our experiences."

"What is age?" Joe asked thoughtfully . . . I looked at him quizically, knowing full well what he was getting at but waiting for him to carry the question further. "I mean," he continued, and I knew that he was reaching deep in his feelings for an idea, "age usually means mere survival.

Medical Digest had a story about a reporter questioning a ninety-year-old man about how he had managed to live so long. The man said, 'It's good living habits. Good food, good sleep, plenty of physical exercise, and moderation in everything.' The reporter interjected, 'But I had an uncle who did all those things and he died at fifty.' 'That's just what I was saying,' the elderly one replied indignantly, 'He didn't do them long enough.' "

Treating People

We laughed, then waited, as I could see Joe's mind was gnawing at something that had been said earlier. He said, "That statement of the dean's about teaching medical students that 'we have treated disease in the past; now we will treat people,' is in line with some things you have often said, isn't it?"

"Yes, the statement I heard at the Mayo Clinic last year that eighty-three per cent of the people who go there have no organic disease—which is about the per-

The pain in your belly will be treated because it may be causing your work or your marriage to go badly," I came back at him. "I know a fellow who did badly in his job for three years until he had his gall-bladder removed—then both his work and his marriage improved. On the other hand, why do so many people go to clinics and doctors when nothing is organically wrong with them? The body is made for health, just as the mind and the emotions, all a part of the same whole, are made for health. They fight hard for health, but many people cling to illness." I was sticking by this conviction for it was the foundation of my whole thinking. Through the years this was the recurring statement of the numerous doctors with whom I had worked: the body and the mind fight for health.

Well, it's the only time some people get treated like people," Joe added thoughtfully, pushing on readily into the causes of behavior as is his custom, for he is never content, as most of us are, to let an observation rest upon its simple statement. "If you are sick, then people pay some attention to you, especially if you've got some unusual condition. I remember when my daughter, Betsy, was in the hospital I heard about a fellow who was having a heart operation, and they used that new machine which circulates the blood while they stop the heart to operate on it. An intern told me there were thirty doctors and nurses watching the operation. . . . I suppose nobody watches a gall-blader operation, not even the surgeon who is doing it," he added

"Well, some surgeons have performed that operation so often that they could do it in the dark, but I'm sure that what you were saying is true-being sick is a way of getting attention . . . . and think of the alibis that illness gives a person. You aren't responsible if you're sick. . . . You say to this one 'come and he cometh, and to that one go and he goeth.' Even a king has no more power than that." Now we were onto a subject I had often pondered—the temptation to cling to the 'beloved symptom,' as Dr. William Osler has called it. "Are you suggesting that people are sick deliberately," Joe brought me up sharply, knowing full well that I didn't, but making me keep it straight.

in that they don't know how they bring about the illness, nor do they know that their complaints have little or no physical basis," I emphasized, knowing that we were again dealing with the old problem of how free are we in making the decisions that we make. "These eighty-three per cent with no organic disease who go to doctors have nothing that a good case of being needed wouldn't cure. I know a woman who for years had been taken with aches and complaints and sicknesses which kept her daughter waiting upon her. Came the day when the daughter got sick. The mother forgot her aches and pains and began waiting upon the daughter-her health has not been so good in years."

"What you are saying," Joe put in, seeking to rephrase my statement, for as he said one time—until you have restated and modified an idea it is not really a part of you, "Physical health is inevitably tied in with and related to a person's sense of significance."

"I call it a sense of self-awareness, which is really a sense of worth-whileness, of being a person."

"Sounds kind of preachy to me," Joe smiled, with a twinkle in his eye.

"Call it what you will," I rebuked him with some feeling. "The evidence, well-known to every doctor, is that the body and the mind are made for health. They maintain health and fight for the recovery of health when illness overtakes them if the person in the body can direct its attention to something besides concentrating upon itself."

"In other words, lose oneself in something greater than oneself," Joe followed through.

"Yes. Especially that large number of people who go to clinics and physicians' offices, who have no organic disease but who really have problems that are outside the traditional area of the physician's work. Whether the doctor likes it or not, he has had to become priest as well as physician. According to one careful study, a third of the people in a given community were sick in one way or another."

"Suppose that is the nation's average?" Joe inquired, then added, "in the healthiest, best fed nation with the highest living standard in the world."

"While our life-expectancy is longer than any nation, it is not certain that we are healthier. Health, for most people and in the minds of most doctors, means that they don't hurt any place," I continued.

"That's pretty flat, isn't it?" Joe observed cryptically. "Just don't hurt any place."

"Not only flat," I added, knowing that here we were again dealing with vague generalities, "but the human creature cannot endure such a condition. He must find something that claims his attention and which he believes is worth doing. It may be his work; it may be taking care of a family; it may be a skill; it even may be performing well in a sport—it can be any challenge that he becomes convinced is worth-while."

"Often found through his religion where his own concerns become merged into concerns greater than his own," Joe added. "Then how do you account for the fact that religious people are often sick . . ministers have nervous breakdowns." Joe was baiting me and I knew it.

"Not because of overwork, as was naively claimed in an article in Life magazine a few months ago," I fired back. "Of course religious people are sick; not because they are religious but because they are people, and people worry. The healing power of the mind and body is blocked through worry, and worry overtakes us when we don't have something worth-while that claims our attention and keeps us occupied. So often the message of religion is presented upon a fear psychology. 'Get religion or you'll go to hell.'

"That emphasis should really increase illness, for it concentrates the individual's attention upon his unworthiness. Any evidence that it does?" Joe asked, following up my suggestion.

"Who knows. No one has studied the results of a fear psychology of religion

. . . Of course, there is the parallel emphasis upon forgiveness and acceptance, and many people go ahead to devote themselves to some service effort that is gratifying—to something greater than them-selves."

"Then where does greater leisure get us . . . more sickness or more creativity?" Joe asked, shifting the conversation.

"Should mean greater creativity, but it remains to be seen-could mean greater clinics and more doctors, but I'm certain that the doctor increasingly will examine the person as well as his body. A spiritual stethoscope and spiritual X-ray are rapidly being added to the physician's necessary equipment.'

"I'm sure that when these are addedshall we say, developed, because they have always been a part of many physicians' concern-we will want them to be in the hands of competent persons," Joe added by way of summarizing our conversation.

'It means more medical training for the clergy and more psychiatric-philosophicalspiritual training for the physician," I added. "He's getting more psychiatric training, but still not much philosophicaltheological help. . .

But above all, it means the knowledge on the part of the public that while the body and the mind are made for health, they should seek help from the physician or clergyman when they need help, and that they should not be surprised when these two are found consulting with each other."

"With the consent of the patient," Joe said as he rose to leave.

I nodded, "And to the patient's benefit."

Made for Health

While this conversation started out with a discussion of the problems of aging, it rather quickly moved on to a consideration of health problems in general, for the two cannot be separated. I am convinced that the public needs to be familiar with the fact that the body and mind are made for health, and function best in achieving this health when attention is not continually directed to aches, pains, and sluggishness that all of us feel. Many physicians have believed that their task was to treat physical complaints, and they have performed this task well. More and more are becoming discontent with only treating disease, knowing as they do that disease is only a symptom. If we are to have help from the doctor we must expect him to examine our lives in the larger context of what living means to us. Not all, naturally, are such specialists, but many are.

My conversation companion, Joe Ross, is, as you may have guessed, a person of my imagination. He does not exist, and yet he does, in the person of any thoughtful companion who helps us clarify our thinking.

Speakers Are People, Too!

Guest speakers should be treated with respect and consideration for their needs.

If you've ever been a speaker at a club luncheon, a member of a committee who engaged the speaker, or one of those who listened to him (or her), you doubtless recognize the following actual scene:

The dining room is artistically decorated, the ladies of this large women's group are seated at the tables, everything is skillfully arranged—but the speaker is late! The chairlady bites her nails, the committee members look dismayed, the guests fidget. Finally, a woman rushes up and whispers to the chairlady, "Mrs. Stevens is here."

"Oh, dear," the presiding officer exclaims. "I'll be right out. No, no," she adds, "bring her in."

Whereupon the speaker, a fairly well-known woman, is led into the large auditorium very much the way a stray dog is dragged home by a small boy.

The chairlady then explains that the luncheon is pot luck and asks Mrs. Stevens, the guest speaker, whether she has brought something.

"Why, no," Mrs. Stevens says, "I didn't know about it."

"Oh, that's all right," the presiding officer says magnanimously. And without an instant's delay, she claps her hands for order and says, "Our guest speaker forgot to bring something to eat. But I'm sure there are some here who have more than they need. If you have will you raise your hands?"

When you consider this incident, remember that the speaker had traveled several hours to keep this engagement; that she had not been informed regarding the exact hour of the luncheon; that no definite arrangements had been made to meet her at the station, and that she had not even been told the exact location of the meeting place.

Possibly the chairlady in the above case remembered to pay the speaker's train and cab fares; but a well-known speaker told me recently about traveling four hours by train to make a speech, at the conclusion of which the arrangements chairman handed the speaker $5.00 to "cover everything." And I wish I could tell you the many times I have traveled long distances to speak, after which I did not receive any reimbursement, or had to wait thirty days for what I got.

Lack of Consideration

Chairmen of committees on arrangements display their ignorance in ways too numerous and incredible to mention; many of their exhibitions stem from two presumptions: the main one assumes that all speakers are wealthy philanthropists who will simply delight in giving time and money and spiritual endurance to the group concerned; the other presumes that a speaker enjoys an inherited speaking "gift" that is completely unrelated to hard work, thinking, research, or other preparation, and that consequently the only time it takes the speaker is the time of travel and delivery.

I was once scheduled to make a Memorial Day address, the arrangements for which were made by a large national organization. But after I had devoted many hours to preparation, I was informed without apology or explanation that plans had been changed and that my services would not be needed.

On another occasion I was invited to make a Memorial Day address in a town hall. After the meeting the M. C. informed me (for the first time) that there would be a parade to the cemetary about a quarter of a mile away, and that they'd like to have me make a speech there, too.

One time while I spoke at a high school commencement, the front seats were occupied by children who talked, fidgeted and made disturbing noises during the entire program without anyone's trying to quiet or remove them. And no one apologized afterwards.

Mr. Raymond is a referee with the Social Security Administration, and a deacon in the Church of the Master (Baptist) in Cleveland, Ohio. He writes for a number of secular and religious magazines.

I once traveled several hundred miles to speak on a technical subject involving a Federal statute. I had understood that the audience would consist of people who were not only interested in the subject but people who were qualified by education and experience to understand it. On arrival, I learned that probably less than six people there would be capable of understanding what I had prepared to say.

I remember well the only time I ever spoke on Flag Day. It was a rainy season, a fact which should have suggested that the service be held indoors. But the arrangements were made by the representative of a big national organization who ignored threatening skies and weather forecasts and chose as the scene of action the steps of a monument. The program actually started a few seconds before the rain did. The rain was descending in a slowly increasing volume before it was my turn to speak, but the M.C. went blissfully ahead. By the time I had talked five minutes, the rain had reduced visibility to about fifty feet and hundreds of people were scooting in all directions. I remember that I got wet, but I do not recall I ever got a word of thanks or my transportation to that unfinished sym-

And I have forgotten how many times I have enjoyed ordeals of which the following is typical.

I was scheduled to be the main speaker at an important public meeting. I had devoted to preparation more than twenty hours that I could have used more profitably otherwise. The meeting was to start at eight o'clock at night. Through the ineptness of the Master of Ceremonies the meeting started very late. More than thirty minutes were consumed by the remarks and bows of "distinguished guests." Then a "brief report" grew into a long speech. When they finally got to me it was after ten and some were starting home. Suddenly coming to, the presiding officer said. "Since it's getting late, perhaps our main speaker will summarize in about five minutes the subject of his address."

On a similar occasion where the meeting was inexcusably delayed, the M.C. just didn't call on me at all and made no explanation to the audience or to me.

The other day an outstanding speaker of long experience exclaimed, "How stupid and inconsiderate can people get who arrange for speakers!"

I lack the facility and felicity of speech to answer that question; but I'll tell you a couple of personal experiences which may suggest the answer.

One night I was scheduled to speak at a well publicized veterans' meeting where dinner preceded the speaking. I was not met at the station although it was raining and I didn't know the exact place of the meeting. After finding the place and the man responsible for arrangements, I was escorted to the head table. A veteran sat directly across from me who was apparently drunker than any one else in the room—just drunk enough to be mean, obscene and profane. He sat there insulting me throughout the dinner and the speaking. And neither the M.C. nor any of his assistants tried to shut him up or to eject him.

But the experience to end all experiences in this category took place one Memorial Day on which I was scheduled to speak at a city of eight thousand in the morning and at a city of thirty-five thousand in the afternoon. This story is in honor of the small city, where a representative of a prominent national organization made the arrangements.

Instead of selecting for the service a beautiful, quiet cemetary which was available in the city, he chose an ugly little graveyard two miles from town. A railroad nestled close by and an automobile path tightly encircled the scene. The parade started two hours late. There was no microphone, and not even a board for the speaker to stand on. At one end the cemetary sank into a large depression toward which the people were herded. I was required to stand on the rim and to shout down at them against a violent wind. It was like talking down into a stone quarry through the big end of a megaphone. And when I suggested that I be permitted, at least, to talk with the wind, the M.C. didn't want to change his "carefully prepared plans." This circumstance alone made it doubtful that any one twenty feet away could hear me.

But during my speech cars were permitted to drive around the cemetary tooting their horns, sometimes not fifty feet away. This, no one tried to stop. After I had spoken about ten minutes, a freight train rumbled by for some more minutes. And then came something extra special.

The high school students had brought along a jack ass which they tied about thirty feet behind me. And at just the right time he chimed in with his unique and unforgettable contribution.

I presume the man who made the arrangements still believes that he did an admirable job. And probably it has never occurred to him that I might appreciate my train fare to that memorable experience.

Some Suggestions

Please don't misunderstand me. Many organizations and committee chairmen extend themselves to be considerate of speakers when arranging for functions to which they are inviting outside speaking talent. For example, at the above city of thirty-five thousand there was a speaker's platform, microphones, a beautiful setting; and cars were not permitted within half a mile of the scene. But the number of committee chairmen still at large who are ignorant of the most elementary courtesies which should be extended to speakers would shock you and would underscore the following recommendations, the carrying out of which would tend to elevate speakers to the status of people:

When an organization selects a person to arrange for speakers, it should if possible, select someone who has had experience in doing it successfully. If that is impossible, it should choose a person who enjoys at least enough common sense to seek advice from someone who has had experience.

damental pride in its courtesy to speakers and should take steps to assure them informed and intelligent treatment. The following are but a few of the specific considerations that the organization should keep constantly in mind:

A. If possible, a definite understanding regarding the speaker's expenses, honorarium, and subject and length of speech, should be had far in advance of the speech.

B. Adequate provision should be made for meeting the speaker and arranging for his transportation and hospitality while in the city.

C. A speaker should be informed as fully and as early as possible concerning the type of audience, the precise nature of the occasion, the estimated attendance, and the names and positions of other speakers. It is also important for the speaker to know where the speaking will take place; i.e. whether it will be in a church, a hall, a roadhouse, or in a public park. And if it is to be out-of-doors, the organization should arrange, if possible, for a substitute inside location in case of inclement weather.

D. Never cancel an arranged speech except for the most urgent reason. And when such a reason develops, give the speaker a full explanation and apology, and if possible, some compensation for the time he had to spend in preparation or for opportunities he has lost by accepting your invitation.

E. Be sure the speaker is given a preferred place on the program with adequate time for his speech; in this connection the M.C. should find our whether the speaker wishes to leave by a fixed time to catch a train or plane, or for any other reason.

F. Never permit "reports" or "honored guests" to use any of the time which the speaker may need.

G. Under no circumstances should an M.C. ask the speaker to summarize as a substitute for his talk. Such a request embarrasses the speaker and usually enrages him, and it reveals the M.C.'s astounding ignorance.

H. Never cut a speaker off unless he is greatly exceeding his allotted time or the building is on fire!

I. Never ask a speaker at the last minute to speak on a different subject.

 Never subject a speaker to a question period without his previous consent.

K. Use extreme care in arranging for the physical details important to an effective speech, such as platform, microphones, elimination of unnecessary noises, exclusion of drunks and other uncouth or disturbing characters.

L. For introduction purposes, get all necessary data regarding the speaker before his arrival for the speech. Be gracious but don't overdo the introduction. And don't "give" him to the audience. It is still proper to "present" him.

M. If the organization is national, state or regional with branches, locals, posts or similar subdivisions, any or all of which use outside speakers, it should provide a printed set of rules for the guidance of those responsible in any way for obtaining and providing for speakers.

N. If you have invited a speaker for a specific occasion, do not ask him after he gets there to make a second speech, unless you're positive he will be willing to.

O. Many speakers like to have a few quiet moments by themselves shortly before speaking. Arrange for that if you can.

P. And before the speaker leaves, one or more representatives of the group should express to him the group's appreciation. They should do it with sincerity and dignity, but shouldn't overdo it.

In the past three decades most of us have wept or howled or perhaps cursed over some phase of the minority-groups question. Isn't it about time some emotion was expanded for the minority group known as speakers? After all, they are people, too.

Priming the Preacher's Pump

David A. MacLennan

These Splendid Priests was the title of a book published many years ago. I saw it on a public library shelf, skimmed it over while standing there and thought of it again only now. As I recall the author's aim, he sought to impress the reader with the high character and heroic service of many of the clergy of the Roman Church. Unseemly as it may be for one of their company to do it, I would like to pay my tribute of admiration and respect to "These Splendid Ministers" of all branches of the reformed church. Not that any of them desire a panegyric of praise, or a bouquet of orchids. From only One does any mature servant of Christ seek approval. To hear our Lord's "Well done!" will be reward enough for any man or woman.

Nevertheless I wish I could step into the studies, offices or vestries of many of my brothers in Christ's service and say, "Good work! Keep on keeping on!" St. Paul said it memorably: ". . . let us not grow weary in well-doing, for in due season we shall reap, if we do not lose heart." (Gal. 6:9 RSV) "Let us not grow tired of doing good," Dr. J. B. Phillips paraphrases it, "for, unless we throw in our hand, the ultimate harvest is assured." (Letters to Young Churches, page 99. The Macmillan Co., New York). In an earlier letter (2 Thessalonians 3:12, 13) Paul linked it with counsel to lazy saints, "mere busybodies, not doing any work" (no such characters can be found among the clergy!)-"Now such persons we command and exhort in the Lord Jesus Christ to do their work in quietness and to earn their own living. Brethren, do not be weary in welldoing."

Don't "throw in your hand," for in spite of mistakes and sinning, you are a transmitter of God's Word. A Christian physician, Dr. Paul Tournier, wrote, "Every doctor is the collaborator of God." Truly a good doctor helps God answer the prayers for healing and for pain's easement. Is it less true of the Christian preacher? Through the preacher God himself speaks and acts. It was said of one famous preacher—and famous in a smalltown church—that when he preached every now and then he would pause "as if listening for a voice." If you listen to God as you prepare your sermon and as you deliver it, you are indeed a transmitter, a collaborator, an assistant to the unseen God whose instrument you offered to be.

You and I are poor judges of our own work. It may be good for our souls and egos that this is the case. Thank God for a wife who loves us deeply enough to tell us the truth when we fail or when we come near the target! Thank God, too, that the final verdict rests with One who knows the secrets of all hearts and who is love perfect and complete. Lovingly a Christian -minister or layman-should be able to say silently to his most formidable critic, "with me it is a very small thing that I should be judged by you or by any human court. I do not even judge myself . . . but I am not thereby acquitted. It is the Lord who judges me. Therefore do not pronounce judgment before the time, before the Lord comes, who will bring to light the things now hidden in darkness and will disclose the purposes of the heart. Then every man will receive his commendation" (note that the word is not condemnation) from God." Rising superior to the fallible judgment of men, including ourselves, does not confer the right to disregard criticism or to act as Protestant popes! But it should mean that we develop a steadier confidence in our Lord's power to use us and our poor best in his service. "God will forgive us all but our despair," said F. W. H. Meyers in his famous poem, St. Paul. So courage, my colleague in the ministry. You mean more to the total enterprise of Christ's cause than you can know. Certainly when you offer to God words, and prayers, and practical help to some of his children. which cost you something in toil, sweat, and possibly tears-you are his agent and instrument. In a centennial tribute to the poet-preacher, George Matheson (author of "O Love that wilt not let me go," "Gather us in, thou love that fillest all" etc.), a recent writer said: "When he was called to the pulpit of St. Bernard's, Edinburgh, many wondered how a blind man would be able to minister to a parish which contained many slums and made many demands. They need not have been anxious. The preaching of George Matheson drew all classes, ministers and charwomen, students and beggars, the brilliant and the ordinary. They felt that in his prayers they were in touch with God and through his sermons God spoke to them. His preaching gave men a new sense of self respect." Wonder of wonders!—something like that may be true of you.

Do you know the story told of an old woman in Matheson's flock? She had lived in a cellar in filthy condition. When an elder assigned to call on her before Communion came to her cellar, he discovered she had moved. When he found her she was in an attic room, still poor, but the room was as light and clean as the cellar had been dirty. "I see you've changed your house," he said. "Ay", she replied, "I have. You canna hear George Matheson preach and live in a cellar." Lift up your heart! To you who may rightly feel that you are "the very least of all the saints, this grace was given, to preach . . . the un-searchable riches of Christ." (Ephesians 3:8) "He is able." (2 Cor. 9:8; Eph. 3:20; 2 Tim. 1:12; Heb. 2:18, 7:25).

Sermon Seeds

Next month's sermons may find themes in either the Christian year's designation of Sundays (Septuagesima, Sexagesima, Quinquagesima, First Sunday in Lent). As you doubtless know, these Latinderived names stand for the ninth Sunday before Easter, etc., or roughly (very roughly to a statistically-minded reader!) 70 days, 60 days, 50 days before Easter. Current Protestantism does not observe this pre-Lenten period as do our liturgically-minded brethren. But certainly most of us note the arrival of Ash Wednesday (February 19th this year), the 40th weekday before Easter. Lectionaries furnish scripture passages from which sermons may take their theme, or background. If the Sundays prior to Lent's first Sunday of themselves make no appeal, February's second Sunday is designated by the National Council of Churches and other groups as both Race Relations Sunday and Boy Scout Sunday. On February 16, the Program Calendar of the Presbyterian Church, U.S.A. suggests that the Transfiguration of Christ be observed, as it is World Mission Sunday. Our Episcopalian, Lutheran and other brethren who know may raise their ecclesiastical eyebrows at this suggestion. The festival of the Transfiguration (Matthew 17, Mark 9) has been celebrated for centuries on August 6. Yet its suitability for preaching purposes in February has merit if only because few of the faithful and their pastors are in the home church on August 6th or the Sabbath preceding it!

Dr. MacLennan, who regularly conducts this column for Church Management, is minister of the Brick Presbyterian Church, Rochester, New York, and part time instructor in homiletics at Colgate-Rochester Divinity School.

Here are four sermon suggestions which may start you thinking of other possibilities, or may furnish themes you may develop more effectively.

1. Swaying Pillars. (Bringing Man's House Down) Text-Judges 162, 29, 30: "And Samson grasped the two middle pillars upon which the house rested, and he leaned his weight upon them, his right hand on the one and his left hand on the other. And Samson said, 'Let me die with the Philistines.' Then he bowed with all his might; and the house fell upon the lords and upon all the people that were in it." To readers in every generation the Samson saga has appealed. John Milton's poem "Samson Agonistes" was inspired by it. Saint Saens' opera "Samson and Delilah" was also. Samson was the hero of early Hebrew folk stories, a kind of Jewish counterpart of Atlas, Cyclops, Hercules. Few Christians today would consider him, as our forefathers did, a prototype of Christ. When we see his name included among the heroes of the faith in the epistle to the Hebrews we are impressed by the author's hospitality. Grim and boisterous humor with little high religion mark Samson's story recorded in the book of Judges. True, he worshipped Yahweh, but he was dominated by passion, selfishness and a natural but scarcely spiritual spirit of vengeance. To the tragic last phase we turn. Do you recall a painting of the scene?

Here the preacher could sketch briefly but vividly the scene and background. Philistine worship of their god Dagon; Samson the captive entertainer. Aside from dubious details it is interesting that archaeologists have excavated ruins at Gaza which answer the requirements of the building referred to in this chapter.

What spiritual value in this primitive, exciting story? This scripture is profitable for "reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness." Is there an analogy in the picture of the sightless giant of enormous strength, not unvisited by gleams of divine grace, chosen because of his tremendous strength to be an instrument for the fulfillment of some divine plan?

(1) Is militant communism such a giant? Will Marxism in its Stalinist or Kruschev versions combined with Russian imperialism bring the house of modern civilization crashing about our heads, or those of our children? Without indulging in the now familiar patter and pattern of a blast at the "reds", is it not true that the immense technological skill and manpower of such nations as Russia and China could be giants shaking the temples of our way of living? Former Communists such as Milovan of Yugoslavia insist that the West, and all lovers of human dignity, freedom and spiritual faith, cannot do business with this giant. But we must live together in the same world or not at all. Is there part of an answer in what Nobel peace prize winner Lester B. Pearson of Canada called "competitive co-existence"?

(2) Is secularism such a giant? Secularism is life without God. This world as it is, has been and ever shall be, no end. Secularized Americans, Canadians, human beings generally, have their temples, and their equivalent of the pagan deity-Dagon. How easily we take lightly the demands of true religion. How cleverly, how masterfully we have created a giant, electronically operated, donor of much that pleases. But what if the giant itself and our trust in it bring down the temple of life?

(3) But the things which are shaken as both Old and New Testament scriptures insist, are shaken that the things which are true and enduring may be revealed. (Hebrews 12:27). The impact of forces hostile to Christianity and to responsible democracy may do us an immense benefit: the "giant" shaking us may send us to examine the foundations on which our lives rest. Recall the story of Winchester Cathedral in England. Engineers found its massive walls beginning to settle and crack. It has been built upon a bog. Tree trunks had been laid flat on watery soil. Such foundation was hopeless. Through eight feet of wet peat the diggers went to build a new solid foundation. What of the solid foundation of our social structure? Strains are visible. Have we built Christian truth into the basic element? Have we strengthened the fabric with Christian faith? Or are the pillars of paganism? "If the foundations be destroyed, what can the righteous do"? men and women of concern ask with the writer of Psalm 11.

(4) The same psalmist gives materials for the answer: "The Lord's throne is in heaven . . . he loves justice . . . the upright alone enjoy his favor." Thus when the pillars seem to shake, undergird your soul with such truths as the Bible insists are "foundational": (a) God is just. The Bible's word is righteous. (b) God is love. This is the good news of Christ, and in Christ. Therefore (c) God has the last word and the last word is good, victorious over evil. He cannot be sabotaged by the wickedness of men, of ourselves. God reigns. God loves. God controls. So from the swaying columns of man's temple we lead our brothers, blinded giants or overwhelmed pygmies, to "the Rock that is higher than I."

"How firm a foundation, ye saints of the Lord!"

II. "How's Your Heart?" Text-2 Kings 10:15, 16: "And when he departed from there, he met Jehonadab, the son of Rechab, coming to meet him; and he greeted him, and said to him, 'is your heart true to my heart as mine is to yours?' And Jehonadab answered, 'It is.' Jehu said, 'If it is, give me your hand." So he gave him his hand." Introduction: This may sound like a solicitous friend of a cardiac patient asking him how he feels. It is the question of a primitive warriorking to a prospective ally. Jehu was on his way to another of his massacres. Today we do not find his religious reasons convincing. "Zeal for the Lord" is scarcely justification for wholesale slaughter of enemies. John Wesley preached a famous sermon from this text, but he was careful to explain the context, and to state clearly that he proposed to lift Jehu's question out of the setting in which it was asked. Wesley asked what should a follower of Christ understand thereby when he proposes it to any of his brethren? His sermon on "The Catholic Spirit" is an honest, searching answer to the question.

Here is Race Relations Sunday. Every day we confront the issue of Christian relations between men and women and children of different racial backgrounds. To examine the question with a minimum of emotion is an obligation for all who follow Christ, for all who love their country and desire that it should be truly Christian.

(1) Agreement on basic matters—faith in God, love of Christ, desire to see his kingly rule of righteous, holy love prevail in every area of human activity—can be reached among persons of diverse background, color, social and economic status. Without oversimplifying the problem or its solution, is not the essential thing the One who unites us?

"Not what I do believe But Whom . . ."

(2) When essential agreement is discovered, then "hearts" beat in the same rhythm of understanding, of Christian love. "Is your heart as my heart? . . . . give me your hand." As a great statesman of our nation and time once wrote, one of the most satisfying characteristics of Americans shows in the common phrase, "I'll go along with you." Differences, doubts on secondary matters may remain but "I'll go along with you" on the main business. Christians continue to differ on many creedal and liturgical points, but the more Christ's love permeates their lives the more united they are on things which matter most.

(3) Only as Christ lives in our hearts can our hearts be right and our hands joined in brotherly affection and fraternal cooperation. "For this reason I bow my knees before the Father, from whom every family in heaven and on earth is named, that . . . he may grant you to be strengthened with might through his Spirit in the innerman, and that Christ may dwell in your hearts through faith (Ephesians 3:14-17). "Here", the apostle writes of the heart, the inner life and spirit, "hid with Christ in God," "here there cannot be Greek and Jew, circumcised and uncircumcised, barbarian, Scythian, slave, free man, but Christ is all, and in all." (Colossians 3:3, 11).

Writing in the Syracuse (N.Y.) Herald-Journal two years ago (February 16, 1956), Irene Corbally Kuhn related an illuminating experience during World War II. "We discover in times of national crisis," she said, "that color has nothing to do with a man's heart or character. No race has a monopoly on virtue, and every race has its heroes and devils. We discovered in the war that there are no racial or religious prejudices on the battlefield or in foxholes; that on the threshold of death men learn they are brothers. I remember one night in 1942, on a train going West. We were all strangers talking without bothering to introduce ourselves, Americans united by the war. The conversation had turned to the question of race prejudice in the armed forces and at home. A young naval officer on his first leave since Pearl Harbor listened for a while and then said:

"Let me tell you about Lieutenant Levy and Seaman O'Brien, a nice American-Irish kid."

The officer related that the lieutenant was about to leave his South Pacific base on a mission by air which included certain islands, the scene of recent bloody combat. O'Brien approached him the day before the group was to leave.

You going to cover Island X, Lieutenant?'

'Maybe,' the officer said.

'Sir, could you do me a great favor? My two brothers-they were in the Marines-they're buried there. Could you try to find their graves? If you have time, I mean, I sure would like to know what it's like where they're buried.

The lieutenant promised he'd visit the graves and when the party reached the island he asked for an hour's leave for his personal mission. His commander went along with him and they found the graves of the O'Brien boys. The two boys were buried there, side by side, under the white crosses of the Christian faith. And to their right and left were graves marked by the Star of David where two Jewish boys were buried. The lieutenant went into the jungle nearby and dug up some flowers. He planted them on the graves. Then he took a picture of the graves. Back at the base he developed and printed the shot and gave it to Seaman O'Brien, and described the scene to him. The kid studied the picture carefully-the two Christian crosses on the grave of his brothers, flanked by the Star of David on the neighboring Jewish graves. He couldn't talk for a minute.

The train whistled and we watched our young officer. He was back on his ship, remembering that moment. He went on after a pause. "When O'Brien finally looked up from the picture to thank me, I saw tears in his eyes. I had a lump in my withroat, too. The kid just looked at me with a kind of slow, remembering smile, and he said: 'Gee, Lieutenant Levy, my brothers always did keep swell company.'"

III. Now I Get Me Up to Wake. Of course you've guessed it. Title is from the morning prayer which someone wrote to complement the familiar, "Now I lay me down to sleep."

"Now I get me up to wake, I pray the Lord my soul to shake."

(Does anyone know the rest of it? I've lost it in my forgettery.) If such a title leaves you cold, you could speak on "Top Flight," or "Glory and the Grey—Mountain Top and Valley." Textual background and basis is Luke 9:28-30 (or Matthew 17:1-8 or verse 9 and following if you wish to link the Transfiguration with the way of the Cross.)

Introduction: Etch in the setting of this picture. Jesus is about to begin his journey to Jerusalem and to crucifixion outside that city's gate. Always he sought God's approval for any step he might take. On the mountain where he was transfigured, he sought and received God's approval. In a mysterious encounter with two of the great spiritual leaders of Israel's past Jesus heard Moses and Elijah, law-giver and prophet, say "Go on."

One sentence in Luke's report of this summit conference is arresting. James Moffatt translated it (verse 32) "Now Peter and his companions had been overpowered with sleep, but on waking up they saw his glory." (1) How much do we miss because our minds are asleep? Every town and city contains respectable residents who are moral and spiritual somnambulists. These can be more subversive of spiritual vitality than some other " -- ists." Russia demonstrates her disciplined devotion to technological improvements, her incurable desire to capture the world for her demonic pseudo-religion of communism. Our complacent, proud fellow-citizens (careful! I may be one), sleep on. We perform normal actions as if we were wide awake. We talk in our sleep as well as in other people's sleep. What causes us to grow somnolent? (a) Inertia derived from love of comfortableness. Whenever any soul is "at ease in Zion" whether this be a church or a suburb, one causative factor may be heavy doses of the drugtranquillity-at-any-price. (b) Another cause is unwillingness to think. Mental laziness dopes us. We may not even care about facing significant questions, or our doubts. We bat back and forth platitudes, stereotypes, cliches. Incidentally, Russia docs not disparage "egg-heads" or intellectuals. To be a professor in that strange land is to be among the aristocracy. And such "comrades" are permitted to thinkat least in scientific fields! (c) Prejudice is a soporific. It not only goads men to do terrifying things-night-marish deeds, but it makes us unaware of truth.

(2) But life comes like a call from a central switchboard in a hotel saying. Time to get up!" (a) Sorrow stirs our sleeping souls to wakefulness. Tears can cleanse our eyes, make us perceptive. Have you not observed a person grow in awareness of life's deeper meaning, of human need which can be met, in understanding of self and of other selves, through walking a dark mile with pain or bereavement? More than one teacher of music, more than one critic, has said of an artist: "She will be great when she has suffered a little more." Cruel as it seems, it carries insight. A pearl is the result of an agony in a little sea creature. Lustre from being fully alive sometimes seems to come from sorrow. (b) Dr. William Barclay wrote in one of his lucid expositions that love is a great awakener. He recalled a fugitive saying of poet Robert Browning. Browning tells of two people who fell in love. "She looked at him. He looked at her as a lover can-'and suddenly life awoke.' " What of the love for Christ, because he first loved us? Many a sacrifice is accepted and unmentioned by the person making it, not for love of humanity as for love of him who loved us and gave himself for us. (c) On a day when we think of the world mission of Christ's people, a sense of human need can "stab us broad awake." Children suffering from undernourishment from disease, from cruelty and neglect-whether African, Asian, American, European-are little children suffering. Period. What of our own need for forgiveness, for acceptance, for one whom we can trust and follow "through hell and high water"? Through crisis and storm?

'On waking up they saw his glory."

(3) If a third emphasis is desired, manifestly it should deal with verses 37-45 in this 9th chapter. This is the descent to the plain of everyday demands and disappointments. The cloistered, monastic, ascetic life is not for Christ's men and women. Mountain top experiences are necessary. Summit conferences are prologue to advance. But these cannot be prolonged. As in the narrative there are situations beyond the control of unequipped men. There are demons to be expelled. There is a cross to face and carry.

IV. "How Much?" Text—Matthew 27,

28, and in addition verses 17-28 should be read and studied. "... The Son of man came not to be served but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many.' "How much?" is one of the most used phrases in the English language. Americans with their love of things are supposed to ask this more than any other question. But an English writer, Miss Rita F. Snowden, recalls that in an early travel book on Russia she learned that an Englishspeaking traveler reported being able to find his way through the vast country of what is now the U.S.S.R., by mastering two simple Russian words. One was the word for tea, the other was the work "Skolko", meaning "How much?" When he needed bread or lodging or transport or clothing out came the word "Skolko?" "How much?"

On Ash Wednesday when the Lenten season begins, as on the first Sunday of Lent (February 23) it is a good question to ask concerning mastery of the art of Christian living. We ought to be able to approach life itself with the equivalent of "Skolko?" "How much?"

Even for non-liturgical Protestants Lent should be a season in which we take interior discipline seriously, and by concern for skills in prayer, in worship, in Bible interpretation and application, in winning others to Christ and the Church, in helping any in need we may help—grow in grace, in knowledge, in Christlikeness.

How much are we prepared to pay? How much do we really want? One way to deal with the cost of Christian living would be to face the question, How much have we been given? Said Dr. Albert Schweitzer, Christ's gifted and faithful apostle to Africans, "One thing stirs me when I look back at my youthful daysthe fact that so many people gave me something or were something to me withour knowing it. . . . Hence I always think that we live, spiritually, by what others have given to us in the significant hours of our life. . . . Out of the depths of my feeling of happiness, there grew up gradually within me an understanding of the saying of Jesus, that we must not treat our lives as being for ourselves alone. . . .

How much have we that we did not earn or deserve? Life, love, friendship, freedom, our country, our health, what the late Dr. John Watson (Ian Maclaren) called beautifully "the kindly light of reason"? Our salvation? How much shall we give in return? Tag end of our days, the last frayed ounce of our energy? The "tips" of our income?

Miss Snowden is my source of a deeply wise saying by another dedicated woman of our time, the late Winifred Holtby, novelist: "I ask that I may be permitted to love much, to serve to the utmost limit of my capacity, and to keep faith with that high vision which men call God. I shan't do it wholly. Nobody does that. I only want never to stop caring." How much will you give in exchange for your life-forgiven, transformed, made thrilling with meaning and hope in Christ? How much will you give to make the Lenten season an enriching, growing time for your fellow-souls? (A sermon could follow Miss Holtby's statement: (1) to love much, (2) to serve to the utmost limit, (3) to keep faith with God. Somewhere in such a sermon would come Matthew Arnold's sublime lines:

Were the whole realm of nature mine,

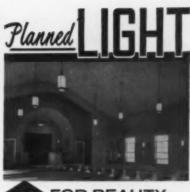

That were an offering far too small;

Love so amazing, so divine,

Demands my soul, my life, my all.

Parson's Book-of-the-month

When it comes to homiletical illustrations never underestimate the power and resourcefulness of a woman! Especially when the name is Margaret T. Applegarth. You may know her earlier books, Men as Trees Walking, Moment by Moment, etc. Always interesting, invariably sprightly, Miss Applegarth's most recent book, Twelve Baskets Full (Harper & Brothers, New York. 1957. pp. 245. $3.00) is her best, for this reader's money. And it deals with money, but in no sordid, materialistic way. I had to add that last trio of words; so many of us church folk are sensitive about what we call materialism. Miss Applegarth shows us that what the late Bishop Francis J. McConnell called Christian materialism is a fact, and a glorious one. For these 32 chapters are insights into the meaning, the necessity, the purpose and the privilege of Christian stewardship of what older preachers were wont to call time, talents, treasure. There isn't anything old or old-fashioned about the discussion in these pages. When she uses statistics, e.g.-last year consumers in this country spent $11/2 billion on candy: $1 billion on baby-sitters; $500 million on dogs (page 7) the figures get under our skins and open our pocketbooks a little wider. When she tells us that "Some of my best friends are tithers" (chapter 18) we look with amazement at the "standards" to which a member of the Church of South India must subscribe, and the membership commitment of the Church of the Saviour, Washington, D.C. and we wonder if we've been going soft

He's not all there (Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them; Matthew 18:20). This ought to be a perfect description of a Budget Committee at work. No, the problem of the Protestant clergy today is not how to make the ministry more possible. The problem is how to live as redeemed and redeeming men with its impossibility. Certain mechanical approaches to this problem from the outside can be helpful up to a point; rearrangement of time and workload, multiple staff, improvements in efficiency in administration, consultation between laity and minister about the problem and agreement on policy and priorities, and so on. But is it not obvious that the fundamental answer must come from inside the minister himself? While this latter answer will include vocational self-evaluation and psychological self-understanding, its basic elements will be theological and devotional. Outward distraction cannot undo a man unless it gets inside him, and the instant a minister locates the blame for his distraction outside himself he is confessing his own lack of inward integrity. Today's minister is usually distracted because he is a distracted person, period. Life outwardly will not take on wholeness until he himself becomes a whole man.—Professor Paul W. Hoon, "Building Up Breaking-Down Parsons," in The Christian Century, Nov. 6, 1957, page 1314.

No man can serve two masters simultaneously, as was pointed out a long time ago and as we affect to believe. Neither can any society serve with equal devotion the philosophy of materialism and the religion of Jesus Christ. On the basic levels of decision, from time to time, there come moments when a clear choice must be made . . . In 1946 it would have been technically possible for the United States to have destroyed Russia before Russia acquired atomic bombs of her own. Some people thought she should have done so. But in the moment of decision it turned out to be morally impossible. At the sticking point the American government was Christian, and it still is. Since this is the kind of people we are, why not admit it above the propaganda level? Why not admit further that we have neither the ability nor the desire to beat Russia in technology merely for the sake of beating her? . . . This is not the advice of a suicide or even of what used to be called a pacifist, for I do not believe it essential to Christ's teachings to offer your throat to a murderer. But I do believe it essential not to be so afraid of death as we now are, not to be so full of hate and fear as we now are. . . I believe a dozen Schweitzers would be a better guarantee of safety than three dozen Edisons and ten dozen Henry Fords . . . I believe we should ask ourselves this question: "If the worst comes to the worst, do we prefer to die like Christians or like terrified hysterics?" And I believe finally that if we answer that question properly, wisdom will come with the cessation of our fear, and after wisdom that mysterious defender our ancestors called the Grace of God. -Hugh MacLennan, eminent Canadian novelist, author of Two Solitudes, etc. in article, "We can't have Christ and Sputnik too" in Maclean's magazine, Toronto, Canada, November 23, 1957.

Jest For The Parson

Prolific source of delightful yarns and popular preacher, Dr. James B. Cleland, Duke University Divinity School, tells of the harassed airline stewardess plagued by a small boy. When he used the aisle of the aircraft as a racetrack and nearly upsether as she tried to balance two luncheon trays, she said to him politely but with deadly overtones: "Sonny, why don't you go and play—outside?"

Abraham Lincoln

Philip Jerome Cleveland

in Norwich

Friday, March the 9th, 1860, a lean, grotesque shape of a man arrived at New London. It had been a rather hectic trip from Woonsocket, Rhode Island. One solitary man of eminence from New London, Connecticut, the Hon. Julius W. Eggleston, stepped forward to greet the Republican candidate for the presidency of the United States. Mr. Eggleston confessed that he could not induce any other local man of influence to attend him on the party of welcome. At that time New London was frankly sceptical of the genius and wisdom of the prairie lawyer running for the chief chair of the nation.

The Norwich Morning Bulletin had come upon the streets that morning with this advertisement:

"Second Grand Rally of the Campaign
... Hon. Abraham Lincoln, of Illinois, will address the citizens of Norwich upon political topics, Friday evening, March 9th, at 7 o'clock.

"The citizens of Norwich to be addressed by the man who, in a caucus of the State of Illinois, beat the Administration candidate by 120,419 and Senator Douglas by 3,821 votes."

A huge throng poured into the Town Hall on the evening of that Good Friday. The newspaper said it "was a perfect jam." Hundreds were turned from the congested doors.

The Hon. Joseph C. Lamb presided with his customary grace and dignity.

As Abraham Lincoln entered the hall storms of applause, loud and thunderous, rocked the packed building; when Mr. Lamb introduced him to the audience the enthusiasm of the crowd knew no bounds. Cheer after cheer poured forth from the dense multitude. The great prairie lawyer smiled and nodded deep and profound appreciation.

Beginning slowly and carefully the speaker laid down some logical remarks that lengthened into a powerful message of two hours. The president had met for the first time Connecticut's firm and loyal Civil War governor, William Alfred Buckingham and the two had become intimate friends almost instantly.

As the president increased in his logical theme with increased oratorical vigor he declared to the listening people of Norwich and vicinity:

"For, whether we will or not, the question of slavery is the question, the allabsorbing topic of the day . . . It stands in the way, and prevents the adjustment, and the giving of necessary attention to other questions of national housekeeping. The people of the whole nation agree that this question ought to be settled, and yet it is not settled. And the reason is that they are not yet agreed bow it shall be settled.

"Again and again it has been fondly hoped that it was settled, but every time it breaks out afresh, and more violently . . . by the Missouri Compromise . . . by the compromises of 1850. Yet how long before it was unsettled again! It broke out again in 1854. . .

"I think that one of the causes of these repeated failures is that our best and greatest men have greatly underestimated the size of the question. They have constantly brought forward small cures for great sores—plasters too small to cover the wound." Hardly had the candidate finished this sentence before thunderous applause like bursts of violent prairie storms shook the house. Cheer after cheer pierced the deafening storm of applause.

When Mr. Lincoln could proceed, he continued:

"About one sixth of the whole population of the United States are slaves! The owners of the slaves consider them property... But here in Connecticut... it appears natural to think that slaves are human beings; men, not property; that some of the things, at least, stated about men in the Declaration of Independence apply to them as well as to us." Again a fusillade of shouts and cheers drowned out the speaker's strong and resolute voice. "We think slavery a great moral wrong."

Lincoln picked up this theme with moral earnestness and argued in his precise, powerful legal manner that slavery was either right or wrong. The South, he said, considered it was right and so the South purposed to keep the institution; the North considered it wrong and so purposed to stop the spread of it into new, free, growing Western territories.

"But an effort has been made for a policy that shall treat it as neither right nor wrong. Its central idea is indifference. It holds that it makes no more difference to us whether the territories become free or slave states, than whether my neighbor stocks his farm with horned cattle or puts it into tobacco. All recognize this policy, the plausible sugar-coated name of which is 'popular sovereignty'."

Abraham Lincoln exploded the fallacy of this neutrality and announced his sound, virile principles as those of his party, "urging the necessity of the union of all elements to free our country from its present rule," and closed with an eloquent exhortation for each and every one "to do his duty without regard to the sneers and slanders of our political opponents." Again tremendous cheering emphasized the power and timeliness of his words.

Brief speeches by Judge (Col.) John F. Trumbull of Stonington, Connecticut and Daniel P. Tyler of Brooklyn, Connecticut, followed the two hour address.

Lincoln almost literally had to fight through the dense walls of the crowd to the Hotel Wauregan, where he was given Room 515 on the fifth floor for his overnight stay. Eager, alert Republicans accompanied him to his room high over Norwich. Judge Trumbull and Dr. Lewellyn Pratt remained with the president until three in the morning, as the men exchanged tall stories with the presidential candidate. Judge Trumbull proved himself an expert in the fine art of story telling and Lincoln called for more and yet more. Lincoln enjoyed the Stonington judge so well that years later the president sent for him to come to Washington and entertain and relax him during a tense, black hour of the Civil War. At this later time, following the second evening of humor, the president exclaimed: "Trumbull has raised a ton of depression from my heart."

The next morning Abraham Lincoln met another man who became a strong friend, the Rev. Dr. Gulliver. He was a very learned and scholastic speaker, the pastor of the Broadway Congregational Church, whose funeral oration over the president's assassination, preached on Sunday, April 16, 1865 on Psalm 46:10—"Be still and know that I am God"—became a classic of pulpit eloquence and power. The Rev. Dr. Gulliver later became the famous pedagogue and professor at Andover Theological Seminary, Massachusetts.

The president left the precincts of Norwich profoundly moved and disturbed. Other campaign meetings and speeches in this state further excited and troubled him. He was afraid that Connecticut was drifting from her deep loyalties to the Union with Governor A. A. Buckingham running for a critical third-term reelection.

Returning to Chicago, Mr. Lincoln hurried off a dispatch to Senator Lyman Trumbull of Illinois, whose people were of Lebanon, Connecticut, ancestry, and he implored the senator, whose grass-roots were in the Nutmeg state, to come to the help of Connecticut. The telegram from the presidential candidate to Senator Lyman Trumbull tells its own grim story.

Chicago, March 26

Hon. L. Trumbull My dear Sir:

They're having a desperate struggle in Connecticut and it would both please and help our friends there if you could be with them in the last days of the fight. Having been there, I know they are proud of you as a son of their own soil and would be moved to greater exertion by your presence among them. Can you not go? Telegraph them and go right along. The fiendish attempt now being made upon Connecticut must not be allowed to succeed.

Yours as ever A. Lincoln

Norwich, Hartford, Brideport, all Connecticut rallied, even as Senator Lyman Trumbull and William Alfred Buckingham, to the support of Mr. Lincoln and the Union and history has proved how strategic and valuable was the campaign of the prairie lawyer of Illinois in Norwich and throughout the state.

Non-projected visual aids should be carefully filed for maximum use by all members of the church school teaching staff.

Burnette W. Dowler

One of the important aids to instruction developed over the years is the "teaching pictures". More technically, these are known as "non-projected audio-visual materials". Every church uses or abuses them. Every church has them somewhere, but on visiting churches across the country one is struck by the carelessness with which these supplies are handled and kept. A teacher will have access only to those pictures she may have gathered during her teaching experience. Perhaps each teacher is supplied with a prescribed number each year. However, rarely ever is there any systematic system for keeping such pictures available for loan nor is there any method of filing them so that one can ascertain at a glance just what pictures are available for a particular subject.

Our Church School is extremely fortunate in having on hand a great number of these pictures. There are over five-hundred different subjects and styles available. When you take five-hundred different. types, with from one to a dozen of each type, you add up a lot of material to be kept under control. How is it done?

First, it would be quite simple to parcel these out among the departments and teachers to get them off of our hands. However, we want all our teachers to have the benefit and the use of all of the pictures. In order to make these audio-visuals available to all of the teachers, regardless of department, we gathered them together in a single file case, appropriately numbered, filed, and cataloged.

Equipment Needed

These pictures, on the whole, are larger than either a regular or legal size filing cabinet can handle. However, you will find that they fit perfectly into a file designed for storing X-ray negatives. The drawers in such a file are eighteen inches wide and are sufficiently deep to allow for the picture and a separating

For tabs and separators, the extra large file folders, as usually used, are far too bulky and prove too expensive for use in this instance. We used press-board cut in strips fourteen inches long and of various widths. This board came in large sheets and because of the size and weight of the pictures it was found unnecessary to have a complete divider between each type. The strips, properly colored and marked, are all that is necessary.

Classification

The classification, of course, depends entirely upon the number and type of pictures you may have on hand. For our purposes, because of the size and quantity involved, we made the following classification. It was discovered that most of the pictures used fell under seven major catagories. These primary divisions are I, Bible; II, Church; III, Missions; IV, Old Testament; V, New Testament; VI, Special Days: VII, Children: VIII, Gifts and Sharing, and IX, Jobs and Helpers. These major divisions are then sub-divided and. in some instances, the sub-divisions are further divided. The completed classification might look something like this:

VB5¹ or VB5². Under these designations a pretty accurate index can be kept, and once the pictures themselves are marked, they can be easily re-filed. We try to file ours about once a month.

Procedures

When using this type of file, either condensed or expanded, procedures are simple. We ask that instructors secure their pictures well in advance of Sunday morning when they expect to use them. We ask that they take only those they expect to use immediately and that they keep them only so long as they are applicable to the unit they are teaching, and make a contribution to the individual lesson they are using. Finally, they are asked to return them to the library, and left on the desk, not placed back in the file.

Perhaps you may prefer that each teacher have her own file and be responsible for their use. We have found, however, that the percentage of use under such a situation is less than when a centrally located file with a wide variety of pictures is made available. Each teacher is supplied with an index of all pictures in the file which gives the number, topic or title, whether modern or Biblical, how many of each type is on hand, and the official curriculum designation either by date or by departmental unit number.

There is a lot of work involved in getting one of these set up. However, the increased use of non-projected audiovisuals and the decreased cost due to more carefully handled materials and better storage will offset the initial cost and effort.

Altar Flowers Serve a Double Purpose

In many churches nowadays it is the practice to distribute altar flowers to the sick or shutins following the usual period of worship. The joy and satisfaction manifested on the part of folks under affliction in homes or hospitals when they become the recipients of these floral remembrances can scarcely be over-estimated.

In my home parish, the Church of the Mediator, Allentown, Pa., altar flowers are given as memorials by members of the congregation every Sunday through the Church year. Hothouse grown, only choice blooms are used on the altar.

Seldom does it happen that one or more of our parishioners is not disabled; the question therefore seldom arises as to disposition of the flowers. Accompanying each bouquet a member of the Altar Guild affixes a card attached with white babyribbon thereto. The card serves as a further reminder that the recipients continue to merit our esteem and that they have been spoken for in our prayers.

For your church....Beauty of Fine Wood and Economy of Functional Construction

Use of glued laminated timbers by Timber Structures, Inc. is a two-part story of vital importance to the congregation contemplating construction of a new church.

One part is the unmatched beauty of finely finished wood. Without pretense or fanciful ornamentation, the timber members create an atmosphere of warm reverence unmatched by any other structural material.

The other part of the story is the substantial economy which follows the use of the "factory grown" timbers for both structural and decorative functions. An example of such economy is the lovely sanctuary shown here, built at a cost of only $12.43 a square foot.

To learn how glued laminated arches and beams can help your church building program, see your nearest Timber Structures representative, or mail the coupon for the illustrated brochure, "Churches of Beauty and Economy".

for CHURCHES

The trial is nearly over, the jury brings in the verdict "Guilty As Charged", the young man steps up before the judge to be sentenced.

There was not much doubt of his guilt. The police had had reason to arrest him. The police court had held him over to the grand jury. His civil rights had been adequately protected, for in America no matter how clear the guilt you can not try a man for a felony (an offense that may be punishable by a prison sentence), until a grand jury has been assembled-twelve men who will examine the facts and determine if there is sufficient evidence to substantiate the charges and warrant a trial. In the trial his rights had to be defended. If he had not had a lawyer the court would have appointed one to represent him. In selecting the jury he had the right to challenge off more prospective jurors than the prosecution.

Yes, he had had his chance. There had been little doubt of his guilt; but what should be done with him now? Some convicted persons are sent to prison and serve out their sentence. Others after a period in prison are selected for parole; and, if some one will sponsor them and, if they are able to get employment, they can return to society prior to the expiration of their sentence. Others are probated and are never sent to prison.

Parolees and probationers in most states are under the supervision of qualified, trained personnel, who assist these persons to become useful, law-abiding citizens. In most states, however, men serving out their sentences are not supervised after leaving prison. This fact in addition to the consideration that normally the better men are paroled or probated may account in part for the big difference in the following statistics:

The best figures available indicate that of those persons who are probated only 15% are sent to prison at some later period in their life:

Of those paroled only 25% return to prison:

But of those who serve out their sentences 60% return to prison.

A Job for his Followers

George Stoll

Mr. Stoll is a layman, the author of a book, "Laymen at Work", and for fifteen years has been chairman of the nationally known Committee on Institutions of the Louisville Area Council of Churches.

Do not such facts cause you to ask, is our prison program all it should be? Ought not every sentence close with a period of supervision? How do the programs of various prisons differ and what can we learn from these differences? How are prisons run in other countries? How about an indeterminate sentence? Who looks into such questions, anyhow?

Is this not a job for followers of the man who said, "I was in prison and you came unto me . . . inasmuch as you did it unto the least of these my brethren you did it unto me"?

Is this not the job for the man who thinks of himself as needing what Elton Trueblood calls, "your other vocation"? If one overlooks this teaching and thinks that just listening is sufficient is he not missing the mark, and building a house on the sand?

The Criminal Court Committee of the Louisville Area Council of Churches has already worked on problems like those above. Some years ago they produced a grand jury manual which has been helpful to persons selected as jurors. Members of the committee helped prepare an improved probation and parole law, which was adopted by the legislature. Presently there are numerous other activities all gauged to assist and cooperate with officials and none to embarrass and publicly criticize.

This committee, like twelve others, each of which is connected with some institution, is organized on this general plan. The institution is accepted for study and service by a group of neighborhood churches, each of which is represented by several handpicked studious mature men. By asking the churches of one neighborhood to accept the problem it is usually possible to obtain a congenial group of men who will work well together.

These men are asked to pray several times a day, "Thy Kingdom Come"; and, to think of ways that they can help the institution with which they are concerned. These various plans are studied and discussed and then a church or various committee men accept a project which is designed to assist the institution. It may be counselling with a probationer or seeking to be aware of the things that can be done to improve legislation; it may be serving the people in the institution; or supporting good men doing good deeds; or seeking ways to prevent many of the causes which create the need for institutions.

In all, visiting in hospitals, childrens homes and various other ways, over five hundred people find a channel to be of service through the Committee on Institutions, the Louisville Area Council of Churches. All this is just a project for setting up facilities for service and doing something along the line of Matthew 25, vs. 35-36, "For I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink: I was a stranger, and ye took me in: Naked, and ye clothed me: I was sick, and ye visited me: I was in prison, and ye came unto me. . . . Verily, I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye did it unto the least of these, ye did it unto me."

Doesn't it seem that just as we have adequate ways of building houses of worship we should have adequate ways of harnessing the resources of our churches to follow the commands that Jesus gave?

proved almost at once.

The boards were asked to approve the basic ideas in the plan first. They were then called upon to give their approval of more concrete points. They were constantly reminded that this was not something that had to be carried out right now. It was a plan. The money in the treasury at the present time did not matter. God expects us to at least have a vision of what we want. This was a vision. Perhaps even a dream. Some could see it taking shape in the church, others thought it impossible with our abilities. In a few months the boards had approved almost the entire plan as it was originally drawn up by the committee.

We then began to ask what part of the plan the congregation felt was most important as a start. Furnace difficulties answered the question for us. In place of patching, we put in a new furnace and we put it in according to the plan. We went slowly but surely from one renovation to another according to the plan.

We used money out of the current expense budget rather than holding a special drive. As people saw things taking shape they gave more generously. Some of the renovations were done by members of the congregation. Ideas had time to settle. No one felt he was being pushed into anything. A work crew almost organized itself and met each Wednesday for a couple of hours. It was not necessary to tell the men what to do; they just followed the plan.

Is your church one of those where the only property upkeep is that which is either required by law, or the health authorities, where in order to get something new the old must fall down on the members heads? Is you church patching and pasting? Perhaps you need a plan.

Do something about—

The Lonely Crowd in Church

Why not find the "Mr. or Mrs. Hospitality" in your church, and set up good welcoming procedure.

Have you ever seen an anxious person slip into church and sit in the back pew? Have you ever wondered where he disappeared after the services? Literally thousands of lonely and unhappy people got through our church vestibules every week without being recognized, and fearful they will be. They live lives of "silent despair," nursing past grudges, slights and misgivings in the harbor of their inner

Big churches as well as little churches have often been wrongly accused of being machines, indifferently grinding out their ministry to the well-known people. The First Methodist Church in downtown Hollywood, California solved this problem. Being a large downtown church of 1,700 members, it numbers among its members stars of the motion picture world as well as people from all other economic strata in life. There was a time when strangers became lost in its large congregation and seemed to be shuffled out the side doors. They seldom felt the deep warmth of Christian handclasps. Not so today!

Our religious faith with its purity of devotion and flames of doctrine is deeper and more significant than just hospitality. But a good warm handshake and personable smile fire up that devotion and restore a deeper faith in God. It can send a sorrowing brother or sister on his way with starlit eyes and a faster pulsing heart.

Hospitality is receiving and entertaining guests generously and kindly. Webster doctors this up by defining hospitality as "suggestive of kindness and generosity to guests or strangers." It is also something we all take for granted until we miss receiving it ourselves. Many of us can remember our visit to a strange church in far away places and we also recall the impressions we received of this church from our reception.

Many churches have found the answer to their problem of ministering to numerous strangers and visitors. Pastor Charles Kendall, the new enthusiastic minister of Hollywood First Church came up with the idea of having a "Mrs. Hospitality." His pattern could be used in other churches both large and small. Once a year the church's ruling body elects eleven coworkers to the hospitality committee. This comprises the "class" for that year. There are thirty-three members on this committee divided into three classes, each with a chairman. This year Mrs. Helen Hebert was elected chairman. She is a widowed lady who has found the answer to living an abundant life. She is the answer to the word "need" in downtown Hollywood. Having served many years as a personnel director for a telephone company she is skilled in the art of understanding and helping all workers who have problems. She is of medium height, has graying hair and a charming personality. This grandmother of four is classified as "sweet" by her fellow women, and "what you'd want for your own mother" by the local church staff. Dr. Kendall says, "I'd like to see a stranger slip through her battalion of hospitality greeters at the church doors Sunday mornings." Asked if it were a possibility, he replied, "probably, but they'd have to work hard at it." Mrs. Hebert has twelve couples (man and wife

HOWE FOLDING TABLES

STRENGTH

 HOWE Folding Tables are built to last. Each has a riveted and welded, high-grade carbon steel understructure like the one shown. Constructed around heavy steel angle iron rails, this chassis runs the full length of the table. Cross rails provide extra support.

Legs are 1½" square tube steel with lapped seams. Each is individually corner braced to provide flexible strength at the point of greatest strain.

HOWE table tops, too, are built to take it. Each is made of solid, sheet plywood. (Plywood frame tops are never used!) Masonite, Micarta or linoleum is permanently bonded, under pressure, to this base.

Strong enough to support 2,000 lbs., HOWE Folding Tables are light weight; they are easily handled by one man!

teams) lining the large corridor of the cathedral-like front entrance, side doors and side rooms. These people are trained by Mrs. Hebert to greet everyone but especially to search for the lonely, single person, who looks like he or she supports the world's burdens alone!

Versatile, winsome and attractive personalities like Mrs. Hebert can be found in every church! These people, like Mrs. Hebert, will not take "no" for an answer. When a hostess approaches a couple or an individual to serve on her friendship staff, sometimes she is politely refused. Her tacts, though known in advance, can still not be defeated. She politely accepts the occasional refusal, changes the subject, and within a few short minutes, full of smiles she has worked around through the person's own interests to get them agreeing. By that time she is ready to suggest some other service on the hospitality committee and they do not refuse!

One of Mrs. Hebert's friends states that her greatest effectiveness is at coffee-time following the worship service. During this time she is meeting the old and the new, making the happy and also the lonely feel warmly welcomed. The chill of an individual's despondency is melted away and their burdens mystically disappear over the warmth of a handshake, smile and coffee.

You do not have to be lonely to be the goal of "Hebert's Hospitality Brigade," but you are a definite target if you are. Many churches of all denominations have these active hospitality groups that record the visitors, send them post cards for a return invitation and call on them in their homes. Many new members have joined the churches in various cities where there are "hospitality committees." One small cross-roads church which ministers to Presbyterians, Methodists and Baptists is having the same success as any larger church. This is because several very friendly and well trained ladies have lined the church door steps with man and wife greeting teams which magnetize state roads which intersect in the community on the Mohave desert. These teams make the travelers feel right at home before and after the service, with hot coffee, cool-ade and cookies. This First Methodist Church in Barstow doubled its 190 active members in eleven months with an active program for giving hospitality to travelers and strangers as well as the numerous servicemen which are located nearby. Often the church receives thank-you cards from these busy travelers.

This can happen to your church if you will invite hosts and hostesses who serve the refreshments from every group in the church and congregation at large. Many church members both in large and small churches can serve on this committee as "helpers" who contribute their services when called upon. Even Boy and Girl Scouts will be glad to help out. Anyone who works on the hospitality committee is sure to burst forth with a richer and warmer way of greeting new people.

Why not try to find the "Mr. or Mrs. Hospitality" in your church? Such a program offers more downright neighborliness and real friendship to the members and guests than a church full of staff members. Give it the sixty day trial and watch your membership increase!

NEW BOOKS

An Important New Book on the Palestinian Setting for the Gospels

JESUS IN HIS HOMELAND, Sherman E. Johnson, Charles Scribners Sons, 182 pages, $3.75.

The author of this book dean of Church Divinity School of the Pacific, Berkeley, California, introduces his thesis by quoting from When God Was Man (Abingdon Press) by J. B. Phillips. Phillips insists that the environment in which Jesus lived was purely incidental. Dr. Johnson thinks this to be too simple an explanation. He believes that the traditions, social heritage and even the geography of Palestine influenced the thinking of Jesus and helped to shape his life. ". . . it might just as well have been India, or South Africa, or Germany, or China, as far as any real significance is concerned," says J. B. Phillips. Not so, says this author.

The political setting of Palestine, in the time of Jesus is very significant, Dr. Johnson thinks. The pride of nationalism, a heritage of the rule of the Macabees, was evident among even Jesus. They resented with inbred hatred the Roman rule. Yet the trade routes and the efforts of Herod to establish Roman culture placed the people under a broadening influence. Trade routes brought the natives in touch with other cultures so that the Jewish natives of Galilee had a social vision broader than one might at first suppose.

Judaism at this time according to Josephus was divided into four philosophies. These were represented by Pharisees, Saducees, Essenes and the revolutionists. The lad Jesus felt the influence of each yet he could never be classified as a member of any of the four groups. Doubtless the temptation to join the revolutionists was strong during the last weeks of his earthly life.

The Essenes are often mentioned in the New Testament, yet until very recent years we have known little about the group. The information which has come with the finding of the Dead Sea Scrolls has now made it the best known of the New Testament groups. Jesus probably was not a member of any of the Essene groups yet he certainly shared many of the emotions of the Essene practices described in the Damascus Manual. The members of this group described themselves as "The Poor." The Manual speaks of God cleansing the member of the order through his Holy Spirit. Josephus mentions that John the Baptist administered this rite for the purification of the flesh, the soul already having been purified by acts of righteousness. (Antiquities of the Jews, XVIII 5.2).

The Damascus Document forbade the taking of oaths by the commonly used names of Gods; Jesus taught his disciples not to take oaths at all. The Manual lays much emphasis on strict Sabbath observance; here Jesus definitely parts company with the attitude of the Essenes. In the Essene community no one was allowed to help the animal which gave birth on the Sabbath Day. Compare this with the words of Jesus about the ass that fell into a pit on the Sabbath. When it comes to the treatment of enemies the position of Jesus is definitely contrary to the teachings of the Essenes. The Essenes were taught to love their neighbors and hate their enemies. Jesus said, "Love your enemies and do good to those who despise you."

The only conclusion this reviewer can reach is that Jesus was familiar with the Essenes and their literature; that many of his statements paralleled those of the Essenes but in no sense was he a captive of their philosophy or traditions.

Jesus, of course, had many contacts with the revolutionists. He was a national rebel both in his attitude toward the church of his time and the state of Rome. Despite the efforts of the civil radicals who were ready to fight to drive off the Roman masters he could not be entrapped in any revolution which would leave the dishonest church in power. His kingdom was not of this world.

Dr. Johnson has made his point. Every facet of the many sided life of Palestine is reflected in the philosophy of Jesus. Influenced by it, yes. But controlled by it, no. I believe that the study is constructive and fruitful and that the conclusion is right. The kingdom of Jesus, the Christ, was not of this world but the drama of the life and death was laid in a land of conflicting philosophies. He came not that one might be a better Jew or a better Roman but that he might have life and have it more abundantly.

Theology

CHRISTIANITY DOES MAKE SENSE: A THEOLOGY FOR LAY-MEN by Nathanael M. Guptill, The American Press, 128 pages, $2.75.

This is the second edition of a book written by the minister of the First Church, (Congregational) Newton, Massachusetts and director of "on-the-job training" of young ministers at Andover-Newton Theological School. He found that many members of churches were and still are asked "to make up their own minds as to what they believe" but somehow too many have failed in their attempts—if they ever started to formulate any beliefs.

The book is based upon the assumption that Christianity does make sense and that its great basic assumptions can be outlined in the language of the people. Since Jesus could be understood by the common people, Dr. Guptill insists the message of the Gospel ought to be described in clear and simple ideas. This book is not a catechism to be learned. It is an attempt to outline for the reader with Scriptural references the essential elements of the Christian faith. The author, therefore, uses five chapters each with a doctrinal theme to guide the reader in his thoughts and beliefs. These five topics are Christ, God, Holy Spirit, Kingdom of God and Eternal Life. Following each chapter are a number of questions for discussion.

This book will serve as an excellent study volume in a young people's class or an adult Bible group. Ministers will find the book a liberal clergyman's answers to some of the fundamental doctrines of Christianity.

At the request of the United Lutheran Church in America a committee was set up to study "the Lutheran approach to Christian social responsibility." The three volumes under review are the end result of this committee's years of study and conference. It marks a very long step forward from the quietism that has too often been characteristic of Lutheran churches, but which was shattered by the experience of the church under Nazi and Communist dictatorship. It also points to profitable ways of escape from the stalemate in which Protestantism generally has been left since the death of the Social Gospel movement.

The first volume is an appraisal of our existing situation by such capable scholars as Karl H. Herz, Charles W. Kegley, Franklin Sherman and Martin J. Heinecken. The second contains a historical study of the varying attitudes in Lutheranism from the period of the Reformer himself to our own day. The contributors to this section are Jerald C. Brauer, Theodore G. Tappert, E. Theodore Bachmann and Howard Hong, all well-trained historians.

The more constructive volume is the third. In it Joseph Sittler writes of "The Structure of Christian Ethics" and William H. Lazareth of "Christian Faith and Culture". Specific areas for thought and action are "Economic Life" by Rufus Cornelsen, "The Political Order" by Taito A. Kantonen and "Family Life" by Harold Haas. Harold C. Letts sums up the discussion in "The Church as Cummunity and Mission."

Obviously, such a study does not pretend to be definitive, but it should prove most useful in encouraging further discussion, by both technically equipped laymen and by theologians, of the vital issues to which the church of our day must make its unique contribution.

J.S. MAN'S WESTERN QUEST by Denis De Rougemont, Translated from the French by Montgomery Belgion, Harper and Brothers, 197 pages, $3.00.

The author of this book was born in 1906 at Neuchatel, Switzerland. From 1931 to 1933 he was a publisher in Paris. In 1937 he wrote the Journal of an Unemployed Intellectual. He translated Karl Barth, commented on Kierkegaard, and participated in the creation of the personalist movement. Since 1947, de Rougemont has been engaged in the movement for a United Europe.

The subtitle of this book is "the principles of civilization." It is the thirteenth volume in a series edited by Ruth Nanda Anshen with the purposes of presenting world perspectives. It is the belief of this editor and the author of this book that knowledge no longer consists in a manipulation of man and nature as opposite forces, nor in the reduction of data to mere statistical order, but is a means of liberating mankind from the destructive power of fear, pointing the way toward a goal of the rehabilitation of the human will and the rebirth of faith and confidence in the human person. Dr. de Rougemont believes we stand at the beginning of an age in the world when human life is pressing forward to create new forms. The false separation of man and nature, or time and space, of freedom and security, is acknowledged and we must find a new vision of man in his organic unity and of history offering a richness and diversity of quality and majesty of scope hitherto unprecedented.

BODY AND SOUL, A Study on the Christian View of Man by D. R. G. Owen, Westminster Press, 239 pages, $3.75.

In an earlier volume, "Scientism, Man, and Religion", Dr. Owen, professor at Trinity College, Toronto, pointed out the pseudo-sciences that helped create conflict between science in religion. In this volume he is continuing his study, pointing out the pseudo-religions that help create such a conflict. He does this with the Christian view of man as the basis of his study.

First he considers the "religious" view of man, from early Greek philosophy, through other pagan philosophies, Aquinas, the Reformation, and so on, to modern philosophy. Then he considers the "scientific" view of man, through the physical and social sciences and psychology to scientific naturalism, with a study of 'spirit". Finally he writes of the Biblical view of man, showing how both Old and New Testaments treated man as a whole, one chapter especially pointing out the refusal of the New Testament to divide man into a body and a soul. His final chapter describes the nature and destiny of man, in which he sets down the incorporation by Biblical anthropology of the truths both of "religious" and "scientific" anthropologies, "while purging them of their errors".

This is a carefully reasoned approach to the nature of man, and will serve as an excellent introduction to serious readers seeking to understand the Christian point of view.

MAKING ETHICAL DECISIONS by Howard Clark Kee, Westminster Press, 96 pages, $1.00.

A FAITH FOR THE NATIONS by Charles W. Forman, Westminster Press, 94 pages, $1.00.

These two small volumes are the latest in the series of the Layman's Theological Library, one of the finest series, if not the best, for discussion groups and classes with lay folk.

Dr. Kee is a member of the faculty of the Theological School at Drew University. He attempts to point out, via general principles of insight and Biblical resourcefulness, the way to understand ethical problems, then how to face them within one's own thinking. He deals with marriage, Christianity at home and at work, and friendships at large, as well as general problems of behavior.

NO ESCAPE FROM LIFE

One of the highly-regarded religious counselors in America, respected for his skilled, compassionate handling of people, shows, in the pages of this book, how he has helped thousands of harried, unhappy, and perplexed people who have come to him with their problems.

From the cases of over 8,000 persons who have come to him, Dr. Bonnell has selected those which illustrate graphically the problems Christianity faces in grappling with alcoholism, anxiety neuroses, suicide, escape via tranquillizers, etc. "The faith of the author himself shines through his clear and direct style, and the case histories are so well chosen that I should think any troubled soul or wounded spirit could feel: 'Something can be done for me.'" of Yale Divinity School, treating of a world faith, shows how Christianity is relevant in the world situation, how understanding between nations can be complete only through a faith that unifies. The appeal of this book will be especially pertinent to mission study groups, or to lay groups who question the whole approach of a "world mission" for Christianity.

H.W.F. WHY GO TO CHURCH? By Truman B. Douglass, Harper & Brothers, 118 pages, $2.00.

This book is tremendous! Indeed it is the kind of thing a Christian owes it to himself to read, re-read, and ponder, for surely after having done so he will want to be a better churchman and a more dedicated person.

Why go to church? That may seem to be a hackneyed question, but this author makes it come alive. In fourteen chapters he analyzes the church: what it is, what it is not, its functions, its institutional character, its future prospects. His point of view is mainly that of the non-liturgical tradition. In a chapter "What Do Ministers Know?" he writes of the amazing understanding that the minister acquires deriving from "the nature of his responsibility" and the fact that his is a "continual encounter with history."

These chapters were originally given as radio talks over the facilities of the NBC network and were directed mainly to the non-church-goer. The author is a distinguished churchman and represents at least the third generation of a family of distinguished churchmen.

A SCHOLASTIC MISCELLANY edited by Eugene R. Fairweather, The Westminster Press, 457 pages, $5.00.

In the Library of Christian Classics, Volumes X and XI are devoted to scholasticism, the latter entirely to Aquinas. Volume X, rightly called a miscellany, contains writings of almost a score of medieval writers, mostly before Aquinas and in his spirit. The last section contains some Franciscan writers.

The book will be most helpful for the study of medieval theories of the atonement, for here appears Anselm's Cur Deus Homo in full and the essential related material of Peter Abailard.

While it is good to have the other shorter selections as represented by canonists, saints, mystics and theologians, the chief value of this volume lies in the more than fifty pages devoted to the three excellent introductions to the three sections and the annotated bibliographies which accompany each.

R.W.A. NURSLINGS OF IMMORTALITY, Raynor C. Johnson, Harper & Brothers, 279 pages, $5.00.

Do physicists take psychic research seriously? There was, in his generation, no greater physicist than Sir Oliver Lodge.

He certainly gives in detail his communications with his war martyr son. Sir William Crooks of the same era was an investigator. Among modern day physicists the name Raynor C. Johnson rates. He has been the master of Queen's College in the University of Melbourne since 1934. His earlier volume The Imprisoned Splendor was a compendium of information on this subject. The present volume introduces new ideas of the mystery of life. "Divine Imagining" (imaginism, he calls it) is the basic philosophy which identifies this volume. He has borrowed this philosophy from the work of Mr. Douglass Fawcett. The basic sense of this philosophy is that the source of all life, God, supplements the progress of evolution by the injection of imagination which brings the dreams and aspirations of the things to be. With this he interprets individual life and human history.

He finds that belief in the psychic plane is a natural thing, a little lower than the transcendent or spiritual. Included in the genuine phenomina in this field are apparitions, ghosts, communications with the parted.

His chapter on death and the nature of the next life is a thrilling one. Yet it is basically Christian. Having said that I must qualify the statement by adding that it probably will not be acceptable to those who believe in the traditional church concepts of reward and punishment.

W.H.L. THE HOLY SPIRIT IN YOUR LIFE by Andrew W. Blackwood, Jr., Baker Book House, 169 pages, $2.50.

This is a good book. Mr. Blackwood has the rare ability to present difficult concepts in precise, concise language without doing violence to them. In simple language he does not oversimplify the subject matter. The result is thoughtprovoking rather than thought-stultifying, even, I am sure, to the average layman unschooled in theological language and discipline. Your reviewer has heard Mr. Blackwood preach a number of times, and each time has barely settled himself down for a good sermon when the sermon abruptly ended. The first reaction was disappointment, but on reflection it was discovered that Mr. Blackwood had said what he had to say, with no superfluous words, or marginal illustrations or parenthetic hobbyriding; then he quit. He was honest; he did not coat with sugar nor sand off sharp corners. Nor did he insult the intelligence of his listeners by talking down to them, on the one hand, or make simple ideas complex in the interests of "profundity", on the other.

His writing has the same economy, simplicity and honesty. There is real food for thought in this book. It combines sound scholarship with good pedagogy and appealing exhortation. Mr. Blackwood is scholar, teacher and preacher, not always found in the same man. In forthright terms he presents the case for the whole gospel, which includes an adequate understanding and acceptance of the Holy Spirit, the third person of the triune God. He then points up the relevance of the Holy Spirit to the Bible, The Church, Salvation (The Primacy of Faith, Deliverance From Evil, Deliverance Into Life, The Baptism of the Spirit) The Difference that Faith Makes (In Time of Disaster. In Time of Tension). The two concluding chapters are Receiving the Spirit and The Spirit, the Son and the Father. It is difficult to keep from quoting from the next to last chapter, for, in penetrating humor, the author describes those who receive the Spirit through fads, emotionalism and organization. Let this passage suffice. After having warned against the extreme emotionalism characteristic of some groups, the author counters with

"Yet I know that often the emotion of Protestant worship is so deep as to be undetectable. Much religious exercise is rather like worshipping God through a telescope. Some Protestants have put so high a value on restraint that their churches resemble walk-in refrigerators. Not only should we worship God beyond the farthest stars, we should seek him in the warmth and jostle of the crowd, the love that fills the home, the search for truth and the emergence of beauty. Certainly warmth, love, and beauty should fill the house of God. These too are works of the Holy Spirit."

A book about the Holy Spirit is suspect to the liberals, and combed for heretical statements by the ultra-conservatives. The Holy Spirit in Your Life somehow manages to capture an essential truth which must be recognized by all except the extremists on either wing. Conservatives and liberals alike should welcome it. Amazingly, it offends neither the orthodoxy of the one group nor the intelligence of the other. That is a real accomplishment. Here is enlightened orthodoxy.

The author is not to be confused with his father, whose name he bears and who has written widely, nor need he draw upon his father's reputation. He stands on his own.

THE 7 DEADLY SINS by Billy Graham, Zondervan Publishing House, 113 pages, $2.00.

There are those who make the erroneous assumption that a preacher who on one five month trip addressed crowds of more than 4,000,000 is likely to be more popular than intelligent. Anybody who has such an impression of the preaching of Billy Graham should read these seven sermons.

The 7 Deadly Sins, since they were given a place in theological thought by Pope Gregory the Great in the sixth century, have furnished a basis for much that has been said and written. The scheme of Dante's "Purgatory" follows their order.

They are discussed in Chaucer's "Parson's Tale," Marlowe's "Dr. Faustus" and in other famous works of literature. These sins according to Gregory are Pride, Envy, Anger, Sloth, Avarice, Gluttony, and Sensuality.

Graham's seven sermons on sin are rooted in these divisions of this phase of theology. One wonders why in the arrangement of his discourses he deviates somewhat from the traditional order. As we might expect, the treatment of these topics in this volume is practical, searching, and encouraging. There is no subtle analysis of the psychology of sin but a message of hope and salvation. The sermon on Envy is particularly convincing and helpful. Like the other six it is Biblical and ties up with evangelism at its hest.

These gospel messages were given on seven consecutive broadcasts of "The Hour of Decision." Many readers of sermonic

A MAN SENT FROM GOD by W. Reginald Wheeler, Fleming H. Revell Company, 333 pages, $3.95.

The title is most appropriate. Robert E. Speer was a saint in our time, a great leader in the foreign missionary program, a man of strong intellectual power and depth of spirit, handsome in appearance and gifted in platform speech. No one who met him or heard him would challenge the statement in Dr. John A. Mackay's glowing introduction that "Robert E. Speer was the greatest personality I have ever known."

seven years as both a missionary and a secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A. For eleven of those years he was a colleague of Dr. Speer. Out of this close association as well as the personal records of over sixty years placed at his disposal by Dr. Speer's family the author has given us the story of this Christian leader to whom so many of us owe so much. Step by step we live with him from his boyhood home, through Andover and Princeton, to his major work in missions, his journeys about the world, his service as moderator of his denomination and president of the Federal Council of Churches. The more intimate and personal side is not neglected and we are fortunate in being able to read many quotations from Dr. Speer's writings.

Four appendices and one index in the closing pages are most convenient for reference purposes.

Gregor, The Westminster Press, 240 pages-$3.95.

I began to read this book with considerable misgivings. I could envision a book about a Scot, written by a Scot, as being a masterpiece of literary art without much interest to anyone other than a theologian or a student of John Knox. After a few sentences I discovered I had not only a scholarly treatise on Knox, but a book I didn't want to leave until I had read to the very last page.

Dr. Geddes MacGregor, Professor of Philosophy and Religion at Bryn Mawr College, has packed into 232 pages one of the best historical biographies ever to be published on John Knox. Not only is Knox depicted as the father of Protestantism in Scotland, he is seen as a man in the midst of danger, court intrigue, and cowardice. Buffetted on every hand by the strength of the Roman Church, he stands as the one man to speak the "truth" which was to prevail over this church and eventually break its place of power in Scotland.

John Knox, the thundering Scot, as presented by Dr. MacGregor, is no ordinary hero. Human, full of tempest, he stormed through life with indomitable courage. Serving as a galley-slave for eighteen months, he survived this terrible experience and eventually became chaplain to the boy King Edward VI. When Mary Tudor ascended the English throne he had to flee to Europe. During his life there, he prepared himself for the destiny to which he felt called—the reformation of his beloved Scotland. Then came the struggle which, at times, tried his very soul. He, too, could make mistakes and be misunderstood by his own people. He, too, could be stung to the quick by the complacency of his friends who were willing to sell their birthrights for a royal

There are so many things about which I might write in a review of this book. Dr. MacGregor has filled each page with an interest similar, in many ways, to a modern "cloak and dagger" adventure. Add to this the heartbeat of a people in search for freedom to worship God as they saw fit and you have a literary treat for both ministers and laymen. The Thundering Scot should have a place in your 1958 reading schedule. You will prize it as one of your best biographical books.

MARTIN LUTHER, SAINT AND SINNER by Theodore J. Kleinhans, Concordia Publishing House, 144 pages, $1.65.

Here is a popular anecdotal biography of the great reformer painted in most human terms yet showing the eternal significance which belongs to Luther. Luther appears on these pages as saint and sinner; indeed, phrases which he believed well described all men. One gathers that paradox, which alone can help one understand Luther, prevents the book from reaching its goal, for the author, knowing Luther very well, assumes too much of the reader and seems unable to convey what he desires to portray in his imaginative popular

GLOVES, GLORY AND GOD by Henry Armstrong, Fleming H. Revell Company, 256 pages, $2.95.

This is an autobiography of the prize fighter who at one time held three different weight championships, then later became a preacher. Born in Mississippi, son of a tenant farmer, and later living in St. Louis, Henry Jackson as the "runt" in his family had to win his way through his fists. Later he took the name of Armstrong, after a friend who too was a boxer, and in time won renown in the sport

But not until years of amateur and twobit bouts in the midst of hobo life, days in Los Angeles' flop houses. His courage in the ring, and his battering attack of his opponents, won the interest of the fans. Then clever training and wise management brought him his chances to be known outside of the west coast area. As a result of all this, plus his native talent, he finally held three world championships, featherweight, lightweight, and welterweight, at the same time, only boxer ever to do this.

But age took its toll, he lost his championships, and on the downgrade, he began to lose regularly to the worst fighters. His million dollars disappeared, and the beer once taken to add weight (he had never taken alcohol before that) became whiskey. His degradation was complete.

Then the tugging notion that he should become a preacher led him to a revival, he was converted, and now serves as revival preacher and mission leader in fundamentalist groups in Los Angeles.

The story is simply written, honestly told, and humbly presented in the third person. It must have been "ghosted", but if so, it is well done.

Some of the incidents are rather slight but all are worth reading. This account of Billy Graham's ministry in the British Isles will remind some readers of the famous tour made in that region by Moody and Sankey more than eighty years ago. THE BOOK OF REVELATION by Thomas S. Kepler, Oxford University Press, 232 pages, $4.50.

INTERPRETING REVELATION by Merrill C. Tenny, Wm. B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 220 pages, $3.50.

These two books are written by teachers. Dr. Kepler is professor of New Testament at Oberlin Graduate School of Theology while Dr. Tenny is Dean of the Graduate School of Wheaton College, W'heaton, Illinois. Dr. Kepler took his doctor's degree from Boston University while Dr. Tenny took his in 1944 from Harvard University. The two authors are agreed on one point, that the book has a message for the Christian today.

Dr. Kepler assigns a date of about 95 for the writing of the book. Dr. Tenny, after reviewing the evidence, holds to an early date-possibly during the reign of Nero (A.D. 54-68). Both writers present the general interpretations suggested of the book with the result that Dr. Kepler accepts the religious-historical method of study. He holds that we must first see it in its native setting with a message for the people of that time. Then we must come back to the present time and find the religious teachings for the present-day living. Dr. Tenny believes the book contains revelation of literal importance both for the present and for the future.

The structural form of the two books differ. Dr. Kepler presents in a chapter what he calls an outline of the book in six acts with an epilogue. Dr. Tenny in his analysis presents the prologue, the four visions and the epilogue. He presents an outline of the eleven poetic expressions of praise each with their participants and their occasions. Dr. Kepler's book carries the subtitle "A Commentary for Layman" and such it is. He presents his commentary in seven chapters into which he divides the book. Dr. Tenny gives an analysis of the prologue, four visions, the epilogue and then concludes with seven chapters discussing such subjects as the Old Testament relationship to the book, various methods of studying it, the terminology used by John, his symbolism and its meaning, and finally what the book means for the Christian today. Both books contain maps, charts and bibliographies on what might be called the most controversial book in the New Testament. The reviewer found both writers very fair and intellectually honest with those disagreeing with their points of view. Both of these books will become standard references for their respective points of view.

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE APOCRYPHA by Bruce M. Metzger, Oxford University Press, 274 pages, $4.00.

With the recent publication of the Old Testament Apocrypha in the RSV, it became immediately evident that a new introduction to these important writings would be needed. It is fortunate that the task should have been undertaken by this author inasmuch as he is both a competent scholar and a member of the Standard Bible Committee which was commissioned to translate these books.

A critical introduction is given to each of the fifteen Apocryphal books, and there are chapters dealing with the literary and historical problems of the inter-testamental period. These include discussions of the social, political and doctrinal development, the canonical question, and the influence of the Apocrypha in the New Testament and the early church. The timeliness of this book is matched by its concise comprehensiveness. The author feels that while the Apocryphal books are not a part of the Bible, they do "contain certain moral and religious insights of permanent value," and they help us to understand more clearly the world in which Jesus lived. The final chapter on "The Pervasive Influence of the Apocrypha" will help the reader to appreciate the influence of the Apocrypha in literature, music and art.

THE KINGDOM BEYOND CASTE by Liston Pope, Friendship Press, 170 pages, $3.00 cloth, $1.25 paper.

The past quarter of a century has been a period in which much attention has been given to race relationships in this country. The Christian churches have turned their attention to the problem. This book, which was written by the Dean of Yale Divinity School, is one more illustration of this interest. Dr. Pope was born in North Carolina and educated at Duke University. He is a minister of the Congregational-Christian Church. His book, Millbands and Preachers, is an interesting study of the relationship of the church to working people in a city in North Carolina.

Dr. Pope begins with some statements on the sources of racial tensions. He shows how in recent years all over the world there have been instances of stress. There are many fancies and illusions about race. He points out how within the past one hundred and twenty-five years such men as Comte Arthur de Gobineau, Comte Henri de Boulainvillers, Houston Chamberlain and others laid the groundwork with their writings for continuing race conflict and misunderstanding. The author shows how from the roots of prejudice a caste system is created and defended by sets of myths. However, Dr. Pope is aware of the opposing forces which have been gradually leading to integration of races. In an excellent chapter entitled "The Theory of Integration" he outlines how a society composed of several racial groups may choose among a number of philosophies as to the best method of dealing with differences. The simple answer that education can bring about the solution of race problems is not accepted by the author. He gives a practical discussion of strategy of integration by approaching it from a psychological point of view. Finally in two chapters Dr. Pope offers suggestions for the church in its struggle with the problem.

This is a scholarly and readable book which can be read both by the pulpit and pew with profit. Suggestions given in the book, if followed can bring a spiritual revival to America.

W.L.I

GOD, GOLD AND GOVERNMENT by Howard E. Kershner, Prentice-Hall, Inc., 146 pages, $2.95.

The author of this volume is the President of the Chistian Freedom Foundation and editor of the Christian Economics. He possesses the background of a manufacturer, publisher, author, real estate man and student of government and economics. He is the author of the column entitled "It's Up to You" which appears in some 650 newspapers in this country.

The reviewer is always interested in books which place the Christian faith in the areas of politics. Those who claim the Christian Gospel, whether they be individuals looking at the subject in a conservative or radical manner as source of their beliefs on economics and government, are forced to omit any reference to conditions of the first century. For example, Jesus never had to talk with a bond salesman.

Dr. Kershner seeks to show that "the laws of God, whether in the moral world or the realm of economics, are one and the same and to make clear, by use of history, reason, and experience how religion economics and government intertwine and intermingle-how they act and react on one another." A free society, the author insists, must be one which follows the laws of God. The spiritual ideals of early America were sources of prosperity. The hundred giants (large corporations) are owned by many Americans. The profit-making motives, the author points out, have been used and must be used to build all the institutions in a free society. The type of government necessary to produce true worship of God and gold will never be a form of socialism but a kind of limited powers giving strength to free enterprizes.

Dr. Kershner offers here one of the best statements for a kind of Christian patriotism defended by such anti-New Deal Supreme Court members as Van Devanter, Sutherland, Butler and McReynolds.

Preaching

SALUTE THY SOUL by Clarence E. Macartney, Abingdon Press, 144 pages,

According to the computations of the writer of this review, this post-humous volume is the eighteenth book of sermons written by Dr. Clarence E. Macartney, from 1927 to 1953 minister of the famous First Presbyterian Church of Pittsburgh. This impressive row of volumes is one of the noblest contributions to the homiletical literature of our generation. The two fields in which Dr. Macartney has made his outstanding contributions have been discourses based on Biblical characters and events, and practical interpretations of the problems of the moral and spiritual life. Many who have not seen eye to eye with their author theologically have found these books illuminating and inspiring reading.

At Dr. Macartney's request, when he realized that his days on earth were numbered, his seminary classmate and friend of many years, Oswald T. Allis, accepted the responsibility of seeing this volume through the press. As Dr. Macartney was lying on bed of pain two days before his death, he said to his brother Robertson, who was leaving to preach in a nearby church, "Put all the Bible you can into it."

Those who have heard, or read, his sermons do not need to be told that this is what he has consistently done in his own preaching. Therefore, it is no surprise to find that each of the thirteen sermons in Salute Thy Soul is distinctly Biblical. Among the titles which leap up from the pages of this book are the following: When Jacob Saw the Wagons, The Soul's Arabia, The Solitude of Sin, The Hound of Heaven, and The Rainbow and the Throne.

One especially arresting title is Selah-What God Hides. This sermon, like the twelve others has a text. In this case it consists of the one word, "Selah." Because no one knows just what the meaning of the word is, although it appears seventy-one times in the Psalms, and three times in the prophecy of Habbakkuk, it is used here as "a sign or symbol of those things which in the very midst of the divine revelation God hides from us." Probably a clearer title for this sermon would be "The Silences of God."

Taking them in their entirety the sermons in this book are more theological than those in most of the author's more recent volumes. But whether or not we agree with them throughout we will find them fresh, vital, and constructive. The closing sermon, The Everlasting Gospel, ends as follows: "Therefore let me sum up the gospel in these sentences: God loves you. Christ died for you. . . . . While the angel is still flying, before his proclamation ceases-hear now the gospel, believe and be saved. Now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation."

Devotional

This little book of meditations by the late Miles Lowell Yates of the General Theological Seminary is the Seabury Book for Advent, 1957. The Foreword was written by Lawrence Rose, dean of the institution with which Dr. Yates was connected for many years. The closing paragraph in Dean Rose's introduction reads as follows: "There is much to be learned, through this little book, of theology, of true devotion, of perspective in faith and life; and meditation upon it will bring the rich reward also of communion with an humble, humane spirit, giving assurance that Christian sanctity is not yet a thing of the past."

The book has four main divisions, and three of these in turn are divided into brief meditations, varying in length from one to four pages. The subject of the third division is In Heart and Mind and among the topics of the sub-divisions are Learning Not to Mind, Laughter and Rallying, and Dimensions Unlimited. The fourth main division is described as Some Notes on Christian Devotion.

This book is well-written. It is intellectually inspiring and spiritually constructive. Although it is not devoid of theological thought, it is not a book of theology. The various sections are neither essays nor sermons but meditations. Probably it is a book to be read in rather than read through. Those who read these meditations will be helped by them and will likely return to them for a second or third reading.

expanding the choir program and improving congregation singing.

The appendices give some valuable information on seasonal music and addresses of church music publishers.

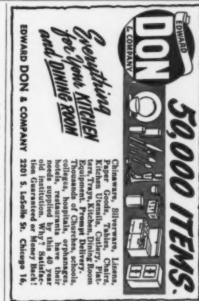

The book very well outlines the organization and work of the choir. It obviously was written without consultation with a clergyman. It rightly advises the leader, when he takes over a new church to start by finding out just what his new boss, the minister, expects of the church music. Does he, the authors ask, expect the music to be (1) a stimulous for church attendance, (2) a medium of evangelism, (3) an important part of the service of worship, (4) an educational function of the church school or (5) an instrument for community prestige. These are good questions for a minister to ask himself.

This reviewer was amused by one suggestion on the treatment of the minister:

"Listen intently to his sermons and when one is especially helpful make a point to let him know it. Preaching is a rather dreary business unless one feels that he 'strikes home' once in a while."

I will supplement this to say if any choir director wants affection from his pastor never mention preaching as "dreary business" or imply that he "strikes home" but once in a while.

I think that the book would be improved if the author showed more familarity with present day trends in worship. The modern liturgist will grind his teeth if any one speaks of the choir as giving a performance. The entire trend in moving the choir from the central position in the church is to destroy the concept that the choir is putting on a show. The processional originally was for the great offering -the bringing of the sacrament to the

While the omission of worship material seems important to this reviewer, it in no sense detracts from the quality of Building A Church Choir as a guide to the mechanics of organization and operation of a modern church choir.

More on Scrolls

THE DEAD SEA SCROLLS by Charles F. Pfeiffer, Baker Book House, 107 pages, $2.50.

This brief account of the finding, nature and significance of the Dead Sea Scrolls is written in a moderately popular style and will therefore serve a useful purpose in informing such readers who cannot easily find their way through scholarly studies. Dr. Pfeiffer, now professor of Old Testament Language and Literature at the Moody Bible Institute, is obviously capable of independent research, as his excellent academic background shows. But this book is a second-hand study, with little new to attract the attention of those who have read Millar Burrows and others.

Weakest of all is the chapter on "The Essenes and Christianity". It is based entirely on descriptions of this group by their early critics and indicate no way in which the scrolls suggest modifications in detail. The whole chapter could have been written before the cave treasures were found.

Church Building

THE ENGLISH MEDIAEVAL PAR-ISH CHURCH by G. H. Cook, Phoenix House, Ltd. (distributed in the United States by The Macmillan Company),

THE ENGLISH CATHEDRAL by G. H. Cook, Phoenix House, Ltd. (distributed in the United States by The Macmillan Company), 383 pages, $9.50.

In these two volumes the reader will find a wealth of material dealing with the two major types of church buildings in English history. The amount of information, given in exhaustive detail, reveals a painstaking study of a lifetime. The distinction between the parish church and the cathedral is that the church was erected to serve the local parish; the cathedral contains the bishop's throne, so that while serving a local constituency it also serves the entire diocese. Many of the English parish churches compare in size and influence with the cathedrals. Westminster Abbey, which is known to most visitors to London, has not been a cathedral for many years. This reviewer is not sure whether it can rightly be called a parish church.

These two volumes have been very generous in the use of plates, so that the reader has a picture of church building, age by age. Some of the pious traditions which surround religious buildings of earlier ages are destroyed as we read the pages. We learn that the cruciform church was not the result of divine revelation but came because of efforts to get the space needed for the growing parishes. We find that the buildings were not erected by praying monks but by hired labor. There may be, however, one or two exceptions to this rule. One thing that surprised this reviewer was the revelation that in building the cathedrals, as in building today, quality was many times sacrificed to time. In reporting on the condition of St. Paul's after the great fire, Sir Christopher Wren, the architect, said, "The piers were only cased without with small stones not greater than a man's burden; but within is nothing but a core of small rubbish stone and much mortar which easily crushes and yields to the weight." To speed the construction of St. Alban's, the builders gave the building foundation but six inches of depth. Nor was the financing of the churches and cathedrals always based on Christian consecration. Levies were made upon the poor at times which, when compared with our days, seem very unchristian.

These oddities are only incidental to the story in these two great volumes. They show building through many ages in England, with characteristic changes in each age as any logical person would assume. The English cathedrals were built on the 'spread-out design" because their workmen lacked skill and materials for building to great height. The columns and walls were thick and heavy because they had no steel. Before the Reformation the walls were covered with many colored designs and pictures offsetting the dark interiors we see today. The color presented bright decoration contrasted with today's darkness. These cathedrals and churches represent the contribution of a great Christian nation to the buildings of worship and are entitled to the respect and admiration of the ages which followed them. Popular Theology

I BELIEVE by Gerald Kennedy, Abingdon Press, 94 pages, $1.25.

It is fitting that the first book of a new series to be published by Abingdon Press should be written by Bishop Kennedy, of the Los Angeles Area of the Methodist Church. Entitled the "Know Your Faith" series, these forthcoming books are written in simple, non-technical language, designed to reach every man. Bishop Kennedy starts the series well, for in his familiar clear style he sets forth what he believes. "I cannot undertake a proground, philosophical, exhaustive discussion of the nature of God. I am simply writing as a witness, telling what I believe about God." Chapter headings include the following: I Believe in God . . . in Jesus Christ . . . in Myself . . . in Life . . . in Tomorrow . . . in Immortality . . . in Triumph . . . in Fellowship . . . in Love . . . in Faith.

This is a book that ministers can use effectively in adult educational work, either as a basis for discussion periods or as a book to be recommended or given to old or new members.

Your asphalt tile will gleam like this when you adopt the Multi-Clean Method

Here's a complete, scientific method of floor care that gives your asphalt tile a long-lasting brilliance you'd never believed possible.

And at the same time, it lets you make important savings.

Save gallons of materials, hours of time

The MULTI-CLEAN METHOD for asphalt tile is a complete floor care program which calls for the right materials, the right equipment, and the right technique.

When you change over to this METHOD you'll be surprised to discover that you'll need far fewer gallons of cleaners, sealers, and finishes to give you striking floor beauty.

And perhaps even more important, the MULTI-CLEAN METHOD permits your cleaning crew to employ efficient labor-saving techniques that allow them to maintain the area in far fewer hours per week. Bulletin explains Multi-Clean Method

"The Muiti-Clean Method for Maintaining Your Asphalt Tile Floors" is the title of the bulletin which describes this scientific floor care program, step-by-step. Initial treatment, low cost daily maintenance, and restoration of old asphalt tile are explained in detail in both this bulletin and a strip film with sound.

Additional bulletins and strip films describing the MULTI-CLEAN METHOD for other type floors are also available.

For your free copy or film showing, call your local Multi-Clean Distributor or write Multi-Clean Products, Inc., St. Paul 16, Minn. You'll be under no obligation.
